Oral Answers to Questions

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

General Certificate of Secondary Education

1. Mr. Shersby asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a further statement about preparations for the introduction of the general certificate of secondary education examination.

The Minister of State, Department of Education and Science (Mr. Chris Patten): The programme of preparation for the GCSE is thorough and of high quality. Never before has so much been done to prepare all teachers for examination reform. My right hon. Friend announced on 13 March a series of measures to ensure the successful completion of the training programme and the provision of adequate resources for schools.

Mr. Shersby: Will my hon. Friend assure head teachers that, given the additional training and resources that we have made available, there is time available for proper planning by teachers, including an agreed syllabus? Will my hon. Friend bear in mind that parents of third-year pupils in my constituency will soon have to choose subjects?

Mr. Patten: I give my hon. Friend that assurance. I know of some of the concern expressed about syllabuses. There is no reason why proper choices should not be made on the basis of the information available, including the national criteria and the draft syllabuses that have been in schools for some months.

Mr. Beith: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that few head teachers or other teachers would recognise his description of the state of preparedness for the GCSE? Does he realise that most parents are not at this stage primarily interested in apportioning blame but are interested in ensuring that their children are properly prepared for the examination? Does the hon. Gentleman agree that postponement has now become a matter for much more serious consideration than hitherto?

Mr. Patten: Postponement of the examination would overwhelmingly lead to the very chaos which its supporters say they fear. Most fair-minded heads and teachers would accept that there has been more preparation for this change than there was for the introduction of the GCE O-levels or CSEs or for the raising of the school-leaving age.

Mr. Pawsey: Will my hon. Friend confirm that the onus for ensuring that this new examination functions effectively is on the shoulders not only of my hon. Friend or his Department, but of teachers and the LEAs?

Mr. Patten: I agree with my hon. Friend. We must make this important change work. I do not believe that we have an option. The Government have shown that they are prepared to play their part. I hope that we can all work to make this new examination the success that it deserves and needs to be.

Mr. Fatchett: Does the hon. Gentleman still not recognise the widespread anxiety and concern among parents? Would it not be a sign of strength rather than of weakness by the Government if they postponed the examination and allowed proper preparation and proper resources to be devoted to this examination so that those worries and anxieties could at last be eased?

Mr. Patten: Of course I recognise those worries and anxieties. Last week I sat through a debate on this subject at the conference of the Assistant Masters and Mistresses Association. I recognise that many of the anxieties expressed are the result of professional judgments rather than of politics. I do not believe that another option exists. I think that we can and should now work together to make this examination a success.

Mr. Greenway: Is my hon. Friend aware that this morning my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State told the Select Committee on Education, Science and Arts that teacher disruption made the introduction of GCSE less sure? Will my hon. Friend give an assurance that, despite that problem, this important educational reform will go ahead whatever happens, so that parents are certain that their children's education problem is solved?

Mr. Patten: We shall press ahead. I hope that in all the teachers associations and unions wiser counsel will prevail than was shown by some last week. We cannot have a national syllabus determined by the annual conference of the NUT.

Mr. Boyes: Is it not fact that parents, local authorities, teachers and students are concerned about the education system—in fact just about everybody except Education Ministers on the Front Bench. Is it that they simply do not care?

Mr. Chris Patten: That is a ludicrous observation. If that were true, last month the Government would not have announced further phase two training and said that we were prepared to allow schools to close next term for a couple of days so that training could be completed. We would not have made available the £20 million in addition through the education support grant for the extra cost of books and equipment.

Mr. Madel: If certain teacher trade unions continue to refuse to co-operate with the introduction of the new examination, will the Government have contingency plans ready to deal with possible disruption of the curriculum in September? Will it be necessary to ask the Associaton of Chief Education Officers whether it thinks it would be practicable to go ahead with the new curriculum in September?

Mr. Patten: I am afraid that if some of the teacher unions do what they claimed last week they would do, it raises far greater questions than the introduction of the GCSE. In those circumstances we would have to look at contingencies, but I hope that that situation will not arise.

Mr. Radice: We share the Government's support for the new 16-plus examination. Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that not only the teachers but the National Confederation of Parent Teacher Associatons, many local authorities and two out of the five examining groups have expressed strong reservations about the new courses going ahead as planned? Is the hon. Gentleman seriously telling the House that, without more resources and without more adequate preparation, it is fair to next year's fourth-year pupils to start work for the new examination in September?

Mr. Patten: I repeat that we have added to the literally unprecendented preparations which have already been made and which were agreed in 1984. I see no reason why every teacher should not have received perfectly adequate training by the end of next term. There are no GCE or CSE syllabuses for 1988, and in many cases the machinery which would be necessary to create them has already been dismantled.

Departmental Reorganisation

2. Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he has any plans to reorganise his Department.

The Secretary of State for Education and Science (Sir Keith Joseph): Separate information technology and architects and building branches have been established this year on 1 January and 1 February respectively. I have no plans for any further changes in the organisation of my Department.

Mr. Sheerman: Given the variety of educational policies that have been espoused by the Secretary of State, his junior Minister, Lord Young and the Prime Minister, what structure of Department would the Secretary of State advise the Prime Minister to adopt and thus bring a notion of vision, clarity and purpose to a Government who seem to have no educational policy and who are fighting about it after seven years in office?

Sir Keith Joseph: I commend to the hon. Gentleman the policies set out and which are being implemented in "Better Schools". Such policies can be perfectly carried through by the Department of which presently I am the head. There is no need on account of those policies to make any changes.

Dr. Hampson: Will my right hon. Friend initiate a move to end the binary division in higher education, where there is much overlap and duplication and a need for better use of resources? Many of us find it strange that the polytechnics, having increased the proportion of young people going into higher education, now contemplate a massive cut in places.

Sir Keith Joseph: I have to say to my hon. Friend that the report in The Times this morning about a decided cut in polytechnic places is rubbish. There is no need to change the organisation of the Department, of which I am presently the head, in the light of any decisions about binary or non-binary division in higher education.

Dr. Owen: Is the Secretary of State aware that there are many people who believe that the time has come to merge the MSC with the Department of Education and Science, but think that it would be anathema if he were to nationalise the locally provided educational service and would see that as going against the spirit and purpose of the Education Act 1944?

Sir Keith Joseph: There is no intention to nationalise the education service. As the right hon. Gentleman knows, merging one Department with another would be a matter for my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister.

Mr. Patrick McNair-Wilson: Will my right hon. Friend warmly congratulate my hon. Friend the Minister of State on his speech last week? Is my right hon. Friend aware that the belief that there is genuine local control of education is a complete fiction, and will he take urgent steps to transfer the cost of teachers salaries from local government to the central Exchequer and so take the burden off a handful of ratepayers?

Sir Keith Joseph: In answer to the first part of my hon. Friend's question—yes, enthusiastically. I agree with every word of my hon. Friend's speech. I understand that he has made the same speech in substance several times before, and I am glad that it has received the attention that it deserves. On the last part of my hon. Friend's question—no, Sir.

School Books

3. Mr. Fisher asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the level of expenditure on text books in primary and secondary schools.

Mr. Chris Patten: Since 1979 spending per pupil on books has fallen in real terms, as measured by the GDP deflator, while spending per pupil on books and equipment overall has increased substantially. It is for local education authorities and schools to decide on the balance of spending on these items, bearing in mind local priorities.

Mr. Fisher: Is the Minister of State aware that the Prime Minister, in a letter to my hon. Friend the Member for Durham, North (Mr. Radice) yesterday, confirmed the judgment of Her Majesty's Inspectorate that one third of local education authorities have an inadequate supply of textbooks? Is it not an appalling condemnation of seven years of Tory mismanagement of education that children have to share textbooks and so cannot take them home and, in many subjects, are working from textbooks that are out of date? What will he do about it?

Mr. Patten: Unlike the hon. Gentleman, I obviously have the advantage of reading the whole of the letter from my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister to the hon. Member for Durham, North (Mr. Radice), rather than just part of it. My right hon. Friend pointed out that Her Majesty's Inspectorate had found that the proportion of books and equipment was satisfactory in over two thirds of the local education authorities, and in only one tenth of schools was inadequate capitation judged to be the cause of shortage.

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton: Does the Minister recognise that if there is a chronic shortage of textbooks throughout the education system we are in danger of creating the "yob society" about which he talked, which is already in evidence at the Federation of Conservative Students?

Mr. Patten: That would have been a more impressive supplementary question if the hon. Gentleman had listened to my earlier answer. In its report the HMI noted that provision for books in schools has improved each year since 1981. It also noted that inadequate identification of needs and poor departmental management were a more common cause of shortage of books and equipment than low capitation.

Burnham Committee

4. Mr. Chope asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he remains satisfied that the representation of the teaching unions on the Burnham committee is pro rata to the size of membership of those unions.

8. Mr. Haselhurst asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he will institute a biennial review of the composition of the Burnham committee teachers' panel; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Keith Joseph: I am satisfied that the representation of the teacher unions on the Burnham primary and secondary committee reflects the Burnham-relevant membership of the teacher unions as at 31 December 1984, which is the latest date for which figures are available for all the unions. I do not think that it would be appropriate to consider another review until the independent panel recently appointed by the Advisory, Conciliation and Arbitration Service to assist management and teachers in negotiations on various matters, including procedures for negotiation, has completed its work.

Mr. Chope: Is my right hon. Friend aware that tens of thousands of moderate teachers who put pupils before politics are leaving the NUT, and have been since 1984, and are joining the Professional Association of Teachers and the AMMA? Should not those changes be reflected without further delay in the composition of the Burnham committee?

Sir Keith Joseph: I am unwilling, at a time when there is widespread agreement that the Government should consider shifting from the present Burnham committee arrangements for negotiations—although without much agreement on what the shift should be towards—to confirm the durability of the Burnham committee by reviewing teacher numbers. After all, the only arrangements for the audited collection of numbers is at the end of the year, so the latest numbers available would be at the end of 1984, and, soon, 1985. It will be time enough to consider this when ACAS has reported.

Mr. Haselhurst: Will my right hon. Friend not altogether exclude the possibility of a further review, and not confine that review simply to a pro rata arrangement, but consider the more revolutionary approach of according equal representation to all the teacher unions? That might reflect a better balance and better working within the Burnham system.

Sir Keith Joseph: I certainly do not want to rule out the possibility of a review in a suitable form at a suitable time. I therefore heed what my hon. Friend says, but without necessarily espousing his last suggestion.

Mr. Flannery: Is it not true that the problems of education will remain huge and will continue to move towards the centre of the political stage, no matter how much gerrymandering is done with the Burnham committee? As the right hon. Gentleman moves the goalposts on the Burnham committee, are not teachers going back to work embittered and angry because they realise that the Government are interested not in state education but only in private education? The Government care not for the education of the children, whom we believe should be educated to the best possible standard.

Sir Keith Joseph: The hon. Gentleman is mischievious in his suggestions and entirely unjustified. Let him read "Better Schools" to see the practical interest of the Government in the improvement of standards in state education. The only power that I have used in reviewing the membership of the Burnham committee was given to the holder of my office by statute by a Labour Government.

Mr Madden: When will the Secretary of State respond to the calls of those on the Burnham committee and elsewhere in education, and resign?

Hon. Members: Answer.

Sir Keith Joseph: I think, Mr. Speaker, that that was a rhetorical question.

Privatisation

5. Mr. David Atkinson asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what recent representations he has received in support of legislation to privatise educational services; and if he will make a statement.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Science (Mr. Bob Dunn): There have been many responses to the Government's consultative paper on compulsory competitive tendering by local authorities issued in February 1985. The Government remain committed to the principle of requiring local authorities to submit certain of their in-house services to the discipline of competitive tendering against outside private contractors and are preparing the necessary complex measures for inclusion in the legislative programme as soon as is practicable.

Mr. Atkinson: Does my hon. Friend agree that the demand for private and independent education in this country has never been higher? Will he now consider introducing new incentives to satisfy that demand? Does he agree that the alarming expressions of teacher power over the Easter weekend will serve only to encourage those who believe that the privatisation of state education services is now due?

Mr. Dunn: As the House knows, the Government continue to consider all possibilities for improving school education. We also take the view that the greater the variety available to all parents, whether in the maintained or the private sector, the better for the future well-being of the country.

Mr. Bell: May I commiserate with the Secretary of State for being described in today's Daily Telegraph as "the most misunderstood man in British politics"?

We welcome the fact that there are no privatisation plans for the polytechnics. May we nevertheless have an assurance that the proposals announced yesterday by the National Advisory Board, as they affect Teesside, Newcastle and Sunderland polytechnics will be set aside after counter-proposals have been made to the Department, whether they are privatised or not?

Mr. Dunn: I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on the ingenuity of his supplementary question, but it has no relation to my hon. Friend's original question.

Mr. Stern: Does my hon. Friend agree that, in view of the Government's wholesale success in privatisation across Government Departments, the privatisation of existing schools should not be ruled out?

Mr. Dunn: I am certainly prepared to consider any schemes along the lines suggested by my hon. Friend, but I must point out that we are concerned about privatising educational services and that many of the least efficient local authorities are the least interested in increasing efficiency. That is why the Government propose to take this step.

Mr. Canavan: As education should be a right for all and not just a commodity to be bought and sold in the market place, may we have a categorical assurance that the Government will reject the crazy proposals of some of the Right-wing extremists in the Tory party and also, apparently, Mr. John Pardoe of the Liberal party, who want to take education out of the hands of elected local education authorities and contract it out to private agencies and private schools? That will be the surest way of creating the type of "yob society" to which the Minister of State referred during his speech last week.

Mr. Dunn: I feel that the hon. Gentleman is in danger of not understanding the debate about the future of the education service. His rather crazy and convoluted question does not deserve an answer from me.

Teachers' Dispute

6. Mr. Chapman asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement about the situation in schools, following the declared end of the teachers' industrial action.

Sir Keith Joseph: Following the 1985 pay settlement and the opening of talks led by the ACAS appointed panel, many teachers have returned to full normal working, but I am sad to say that disruption has continued in many schools in England and Wales. Such disruption is even more indefensible now that talks covering pay, structure, duties and responsibilities are taking place.

Mr. Chapman: I welcome the belated agreement to the 1985 pay settlement at a level ahead of inflation. Does my right hon. Friend agree that any long-term solution must not only consider improved pay and promotion prospects for teachers, but must include an unequivocal definition of teachers' responsibilities and some sort of performance assessment? Does my right hon. Friend also agree that any disruption in the schools before these talks are concluded, or any attempt by any union to dismiss certain parts of what must be a total package; will be vigorously objected to not only by parents but by the public at large?

Sir Keith Joseph: I think that what my hon. Friend has formulated lies within the agreement reached by ACAS with the local education authorities and with at least five of the teacher unions. The National Union of Teachers, to a certain extent ambiguously, is associating itself with the talks.

Mr. Weetch: My question refers to the abiding situation in schools. Does the Secretary of State realise that one of the deplorable features in state schools is the increasing level of violence outside and inside the classroom against members of the teaching profession? Has the Secretary of State received a report from the NAS/UWT on the appalling level of violence against teachers in some parts of the country? Has he considered it, and if not, will he consider it carefully and consult local education authorities as to ways in which this deteriorating situation can be dealt with?

Sir Keith Joseph: Yes, I have received such a report. I share anxieties about it. I have to point out that although the subject has validity, the report represents a 3 per cent. response to an inquiry by the NAS/UWT of its members. Nevertheless, I do not doubt that violence takes place and is enormously to be regretted. I take the view that a good head teacher makes a huge difference to a school. I shall certainly study the report and anything that might be done seriously.

Mr. Lord: Is my right hon. Friend aware that in some schools in my constituency of central Suffolk no homework is being set, some pupils have had only one school report in three years, and many pupils are now having to decide on their state examination options without their parents having had any consultations with the teachers who will be teaching them throughout that period? Does my right hon. Friend agree that the teachers concerned in this action must be well aware of the permanent damage that they are doing to the children and that they ought to be made to carry out at least those basic duties?

Sir Keith Joseph: I share entirely the reaction of my hon. Friend. I have time and again paid tribute to those teachers, including head teachers, who, despite every pressure, have not responded to the encouragement to disrupt given by some teachers' unions. I deplore the disruption that some teachers' unions have encouraged their members to take. It is entirely wrong that pupils should be penalised, and I agree with my hon. Friend. The employers — the local education authorities — must consider their reaction to the behaviour of such teachers.

Mr. Evans: Can the Secretary of State confirm that the sensible agreement reached between the Scottish Office and the Scottish teacher unions has made his task of trying to reach a sensible agreement with the English and Welsh teachers' unions almost impossible? Will he guarantee that no matter what ACAS recommends in its inquiry into the dispute, he will accept it?

Sir Keith Joseph: I cannot give that assurance to the House. The Government have said that they will seriously consider any recommendations that emerge from ACAS. The hon. Member must realise that the position in Scotland was not paralleled in England, where the ACAS initiative has broken the deadlock.

Mr. Key: One tragic side effect of the dispute is the loss of contact time out of school between the teaching profession and pupils. Is the Secretary of State satisfied that this is, therefore, a good time to deregulate Sunday trading, when that might lead to pupils having less time for school preparation? The teachers unions are extremely worried about that. Will he ensure that there is no unfortunate educational side-effect to this measure?

Sir Keith Joseph: I congratulate my hon Friend on introducing his views on Sunday trading into this question. I cannot accept that, whatever happens to Sunday trading, it will have the result that he fears.

Mr. Radice: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware, after four and a half years as Secretary of State, and after seven years of Conservative Government, that even Ministers acknowledge that our schools are in a crisis? As he is an honest man, will he accept that when the contenders for the succession so publicly and obviously submit their competing job applications, and when he has so clearly lost the confidence of parents, teachers and local authorities, the time has come for him to stand aside and allow someone else to clear up the mess?

Sir Keith Joseph: I welcome the hon. Gentleman's acknowledgement earlier that the Opposition agree with the Government that the new GCSE examination should be introduced. A by-product of the present tragic state of schools is the fact that all parties in the House acknowledge that higher standards in the state education service are greatly to be desired, for the benefit of children and the country as a whole. I hope that, out of that general recognition, much good can come from the present misery.

Mr. Fallon: Is my right hon. Friend not constantly amazed at his tolerance and patience? If the NUT now demands a veto on what its members will teach and when they will teach it, has not the time come to scrap the Burnham machinery and introduce legally enforceable contracts between teachers and employers?

Sir Keith Joseph: I need no persuasion that it may be sensible to abolish the Burnham machinery. I need to know what might suitably and appropriately take its place.

Schools (Midday Supervision)

7. Mr. James Lamond asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he is satisfied with the arrangements of local education authorities in giving effect to section 2 of the Education (Amendment) Act 1986.

10. Mr. Litherland asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he is satisfied with the arrangements made by local education authorities for training supervisors for midday supervision as a result of section 2 of the Education (Amendment) Act 1986.

13. Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on lunchtime supervision in schools.

14. Mr. Thurnham asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many local authorities have not yet sought additional funding for lunchtime supervision for schoolchildren.

Mr. Chris Patten: Sixty five local education authorities in England have submitted bids or draft schemes in application for education support grant for midday supervision. Thirty two LEAs have yet to submit a scheme, although 26 of these have made informal inquiries of the Department. Forty nine LEAs have had their proposals approved. This represents satisfactory progress in the short time since the Education (Amendment) Act 1986 came into force. It is for LEAs to make their own arrangements for training supervisors.

Mr. Lamond: Does the Minister realise that the plain truth about the midday supervision scheme is that it is grossly underfunded, and was introduced without adequate consultation? It is causing great concern to parents throughout the country, including those in my constituency. Should he not grasp the nettle now and introduce a national plan, which would at least prevent an unmitigated disaster, even by the pathetic standards of his own lame duck Department?

Mr. Patten: I am delighted that the Oldham local education authority has submitted a scheme, which we have been able to approve, subject to certain inquiries on our part. That represents good progress. But I fear that if we had suggested a national plan we would have been accused of centralisation, and that really would not do.

Mr. Litherland: Does the Minister not agree that a national scheme would be more beneficial and would give equal supervision to all children? If the scheme is left to local education authorities, what confidence can parents have that the supervisors will be adequately trained and will have the necessary experience?

Mr. Patten: This is an issue for local education authorities, and I hope that the hon. Gentleman's constituents will have every confidence in the scheme submitted by the Manchester local education authority.

Mr. Greenway: Is it not scandalous and dangerous that children should be locked up in schools during lunchtime? Is not the Act, and the way that it is working, to be welcomed? Is my hon. Friend aware that some head teachers are concerned that assistant teachers operating the scheme may earn more than they do, and that that is why they have some reservations? Will he look into that possibility and ensure that it does not arise?

Mr. Patten: I understand what my hon. Friend has said. We want to see that head teachers are paid properly for the responsibility that they carry. That would, of course, have been one of the consequences if the teachers associations had accepted the 12 September package.

Mr. Thurnham: What action can be taken in the case of those head teachers who are not co-operating in making the new arrangements work?

Mr. Patten: It is more a question of encouraging the remaining local education authorities to put in bids for schemes. I very much hope that all head teachers will help to make the arrangements work. I know how hard head teachers have had to work during the past year, and we greatly admire the way in which they have carried their burden.

Mr. Flannery: Why does the Minister not admit to something that no one knows about? Why does he not tell the House that the £40 million is not only not enough, but is taken out of the £1·25 billion being offered to the teachers, which is in itself inadequate? Ministers never tell people where the money is coming from.

Mr. Patten: As a matter of interest, both the public and the teachers, in particular, were told that on 5 August 1985.

Sir Kenneth Lewis: Is my hon. Friend aware that I and many teachers and parents are convinced that teachers make the best supervisors? They should be encouraged to pick up the extra money and to supervise school meals. The only thing stopping them is the NUT, in particular, and some of the other unions.

Mr. Patten: I do not think that only teachers can supervise at lunchtime, but some local education authorities are introducing schemes involving teachers. We have made it clear that teachers should carry out such duties on a contractual basis.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: Why did the Government not heed the Opposition's warning that there should be national standards for midday supervision and a basic training scheme? Does the Minister agree that he has now offended the National Association of Head Teachers as a result of his proposal? Have we not seen yet another example of the Government's determination to offend everyone involved in education, and to cause as much difficulty as possible?

Mr. Patten: No.

Mr. Couchman: Is my hon. Friend aware that both parents and governors are writing to us suggesting that some schemes put forward by local education authorities propose an inadequate level of supervision? Will he ensure that when he approves schemes he takes careful account of that so as to reassure parents and parent governors?

Mr. Patten: I can certainly give my hon. Friend that assurance.

9. Mr. Dixon asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he last met the National Association of Head Teachers to discuss the implementation of the Education (Amendment) Act 1986.

Mr. Chris Patten: My right hon. Friend met the NAHT on 3 January. I met the NAHT myself on 28 January. My right hon. Friend and I are always willing to discuss matters of common concern with the teacher unions, although no date has been set for a further ministerial meeting with the NAHT.

Mr. Dixon: Is the Minister aware that the National Association of Head Teachers, 16 counties and 24 metropolitan district counties, including my district council of South Tyneside, have suggested that there should be a national plan for midday supervision? Why does the hon. Gentleman not listen to them? How does he propose to ensure that children are properly and equally supervised?

Mr. Patten: That is the general view of local authorities. I am delighted that South Tyneside local education authority was one of the first to apply for help under the education support grant. We acted in the Education (Amendment) Act 1986 to deal with a long-standing grievance. I am surprised that the hon. Gentleman and others are criticising us for doing so.

Science Budget

11. Mr. Soames asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what recent representations he has received on the size of the 1986-87 science budget.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Science (Mr. George Walden): My right hon. Friend has received 193 representations about the resources available for science. These representations relate generally to the Government's plans for science funding over a period of years rather than to the budget for a specific year. The Government's plans for the science budget will be reviewed during the annual public expenditure survey.

Mr. Soames: Is my hon. Friend aware of the very great concern felt in all parts of the House that if we are to compete with the Japanese and United States of America we must spend a great deal more money on civil research and not so much on military research? Does he agree that we should have a national policy, and will he take steps to move towards that?

Mr. Walden: There is a standing case for spending more on science, as there is in many other areas, but it is a question of priorities. It is a question of getting the money first and of making sure that that money is well spent. In that connection, I should like to pay tribute to the considerable efforts made by the research councils to rationalise the way in which money is spent. But it is not just a question of the Government spending money; industry, too, should spend more on research and development. Pointing to the fact that British business spends less on research and development than any other Western economic competitor, and to the fact that our wage increases are higher by far than those of any other economic competitor, my right hon. Friend recently described that as "a suicide pact".

Mrs. Renée Short: Does the Minister accept that one of the major criticisms of his Department is that resources for teaching and research in science are not adequate? Is it not nonsense that in industrial areas we should be closing down science departments in polytechnics? What will he do about that? Does he not think that a Minister for Science should be appointed?

Mr. Walden: My right hon. Friend earlier described the so-called cuts in polytechnics as rubbish. I do not think I can do better than that. I am sure the hon. Lady knows that it would be wrong to lend her name to a campaign of alarmism about so-called cuts in polytechnics. [Interruption.] I am chairman of the relevant committee of the NAB, which has made no such recommendation for cuts; has my right hon. Friend. He will be considering in the normal way at the end of the year, in the first round, the amount of money available for expenditure in the public sector of higher education.

Sir Anthony Grant: Is my hon. Friend aware that in Cambridge at least there are definite signs of a brain drain, which could be resolved by the expenditure of a relatively small sum of money? Will he and his colleagues fight the Treasury on this much more vigorously in the future than in the past?

Mr. Walden: My hon. Friend makes a point to which we are devoting considerable attention. We are awaiting a report from the Royal Society on the brain drain. We also listen carefully to the representations from the "Save British Science Campaign", which includes many distinguished men and women.

General Certificate of Secondary Education

12. Mr. Weetch asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what are his latest estimates of the cost of introducing the general certificate of secondary education examinations.

Mr. Chris Patten: The Department is contributing more than £9·5 million to the national programme of in-service training for the GCSE. We have also proposed devoting £20 million expenditure, supported by education support grant, to books and equipment for the GCSE. It is not possible to draw up precise estimates of local education authority expenditure, but the general criteria for the GCSE provide that syllabuses and methods of assessment should not make unreasonable demands on resources.

Mr. Weetch: I am grateful to the Minister for that answer. Is he aware that one of the issues on which confidence has been lost in the teaching profession and among parents is the utterly inadequate level of funding of the examination? How has the £20 million figure been reached? Are there any detailed costings which will be subject to public scrutiny? When will any of the money be made available to the examination groups?

Mr. Patten: The money will be made available during the next financial year—it should be available by the second half of the academic year. As for the assessment of how much money we should make available, we took account of what was already being provided through capitation and what we could afford on top of that.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. McKelvey asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 8 April.

The Prime Minister (Mrs. Margaret Thatcher): This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others, including one with the President of Kiribati. In addition to my duties in this House I shall be having further meetings later today. This evening I shall be presiding at a dinner for the President of the Republic of Korea.

Mr. McKelvey: Does the Prime Minister endorse the actions of "Rambo Ronny" who, at this very moment, is exploding a nuclear device in the Nevada desert? Does she agree that that is against the spirit of world peace? [HON. MEMBERS: "Reading".] If the Prime Minister is in favour of a comprehensive test ban treaty, will she say so? Will she—[HON. MEMBERS: "Reading".]—further assure the House that this test is not in any way connected with the present British Trident programme?

The Prime Minister: I have seen press reports on the prospective test. As a nuclear power, we understand the reasons for nuclear testing. It is not possible to have a comprehensive test ban treaty until methods of verification have cleary been worked out.

Mr. Robert Atkins: Has my right hon. Friend seen — [HON. MEMBERS: "Reading".] — a copy of this document, which I have in my hand, which purports to be guidelines for members of governing bodies in secondary schools and which seeks to destabilise, damage and destroy the relationship of head teachers with governors and children in schools? The document is circulating in the north-west of England. Will my right hon. Friend do what she can to publicise to head teachers, governing bodies and parents the nature of this insidious and seditious paper, which is put out by the extreme Left-wing of the Labour party?

The Prime Minister: I have seen today the report of that document in The Times. I agree with my hon. Friend. The document should be compulsory reading for everybody. It shows how the extreme Left really works.

Q2. Mr. Willie W. Hamilton asked the Prime Minister of she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 8 April.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Hamilton: Has the Prime Minister ever known a time when the education system as a whole was in such a chaotic mess and when morale among all sections involved, whether parents, teachers, students or university lecturers, was so low? When will the Government understand that massively increased investment in this area would be the wisest possible decision that the nation could make now?

The Prime Minister: I hear what the hon. Gentleman says and, of course, disagree with most of it.

"I fear that those whose only answer to these problems is to call for more money will be disappointed . . . The challenge in education is to examine its priorities and to secure as high efficiency as possible by the skilful use of existing resources."

That is what the last Labour Prime Minister, the right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Callaghan), said in a speech at Ruskin college. I agree with him.

Mr. W. Benyon: In view of the recent appalling events in Protestant Loyalist Ulster, has not the time come when we should reconsider very carefully the expenditure of lives and money to keep Ulster within the United Kingdom?

The Prime Minister: I share my hon. Friend's view about the recent appalling events in Ulster, when the police have been attacked in a terrible way, which all of us should utterly condemn. I think that we must carry on with the Anglo-Irish accord and do our best to try to restore some peace and stability in the Province. We really must call upon all decent Unionists utterly to condemn this kind of activity and to do their best to see that no more of it occurs.

Mr. Kinnock: First, may I completely endorse the Prime Minister's last answer and express the hope that the message goes to all parts of the community of Northern Ireland so that they will comprehend the determination, jointly shared in this House, to see that the agreement is upheld in peace as a way to peace.

When our country's future depends so obviously and so heavily on technology and trade, where is the sense, the efficiency or the justice in making further cuts in polytechnic degree courses in civil engineering, the sciences and modern languages? Would that not be a desertion of the national interest? Would it not be a further action by a yob Government?

The Prime Minister: The number of places in polytechnics in 1986-87 will be 172,000, an increase of 43 per cent. over the number in 1979, which remained static under the Labour Government. As for trying to get more scientific courses in both universities and polytechnics, an extra £43 million has been made available by the Government to get the courses which industry requires. Industry has contributed another £24 million towards those courses. That augurs well for future co-operation between universities and polytechnics and industry.

Mr. Kinnock: If the position is as the Prime Minister describes, why is it that her own National Advisory Body and the Committee of Directors of Polytechnics say that they cannot make any further cuts without destroying the quality of provision in all the subjects that she mentioned? Will she heed the words of her own Green Paper last year on higher education, which acknowledged that if present trends continue we shall fall even further behind our competitors in engineering and technology?

The Prime Minister: I saw the right hon. Gentleman sitting in his place when I heard my hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham (Mr. Walden), the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Science, who is chairman of the National Advisory Body committee utterly repudiate that report. [HON. MEMBERS: "Not true."] He should know, because he is the chairman.

Mr. Kinnock: In that case, was the dispatch of a letter from the National Advisory Body committee to the directors of the polytechnics a mistake, or did it not take place, or is it another fantasy?

The Prime Minister: It was not a committee. It was a secretariat. The National Advisory Body will not submit formal recommendations about academic provision in particular polytechnics in 1987-88 until September. In the meantime, I repeat that this Government have an excellent record in the provision of science courses in polytechnics.

Mr. Baldry: Does my right hon. Friend agree that this House will not countenance intimidation from the Loyalist community in Northern Ireland, any more than it would countenance it from the IRA? Does she agree that it does not lie in the mouth of any person who attacks anyone who wears the Queen's cap badge to call himself a Loyalist?

The Prime Minister: I agree with my hon. Friend that terrorism and violence must be condemned equally, no matter from what quarter in Northern Ireland they come. I am sure that the police will uphold their duty totally impartially and will not be intimidated by terrorism.

Mr. Steel: Will the Prime Minister explain to the House how it is that, when Sunday trading was not in the Conservative manifesto at the last election, the Government are intending to introduce the Bill to this House next week on a three-line Whip? Should there not be some issues left to a conscientious free vote of the majority of Members of this House?

The Prime Minister: The right hon. Gentleman will remember that we have had the Auld committee report, that it made a full report on Sunday trading, that the Bill has been through the other place and that it will shortly be coming before the House. He knows that whipping is never decided until much nearer the time.

Sir Eldon Griffiths: Referring to Northern Ireland, does my right hon. Friend recall that long before Portadown, when we were debating the Northern Ireland agreement, I asked in the House for an assurance that, in the event of the police needing protection for their families, that protection should be provided? As Ministers promised it and it did not materialise until the petrol bombers struck, does my right hon. Friend not understand that that is why there is among the rank and file of the Royal Ulster Constabulary a great measure of dispiritment at the present time?

The Prime Minister: I understand what my hon. Friend is saying, and I know he will agree with me that we have great admiration for the RUC, for the totally impartial way in which it carries out its duties. My right hon. Friend will take every action he possibly can if any further action is required to see that the families of the RUC are protected.

Q3. Mr. Sheerman asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 8 April.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Sheerman: Will the Prime Minister have time today to look at the chorus of criticism of her Government's educational policies? Her Government have been in power now for seven years, yet at this time her Ministers are publicly both confused and divided about the educational policies of her party and her Government. When will she do something to put at rest the minds and hearts of parents and deal with the confusion and chaos that exist in our classrooms today?

The Prime Minister: This Government have committed substantial resources to education. Indeed, expenditure per pupil is up by 16 per cent. in real terms and pupil-teacher ratios are at their best-ever levels. So resources and increasing numbers of teachers have been provided. I agree with the hon. Gentleman that many of us are shocked at the action that some of the teachers have taken recently. It is not befitting any profession, let alone a profession which expects, and should expect and enjoy, a good deal of prestige.

Mr. Holt: Does my right hon. Friend agree with me that most of us woke up this morning to a marvellous fillip on hearing of the launching of HMS Coventry? Does she agree, further, that the management of Swan Hunter has shown that it is leading a marvellous shipyard in the north-east, and does this not augur well for the order for the new auxiliary oil replenishment vessel going to that region?

The Prime Minister: Strenuous and successful efforts were made to ensure that the frigate HMS Coventry was launched on time, and I congratulate all concerned. I have nothing further to report on the order which two shipyards are hoping will come to them. Further inquiries are being made to ensure that the figures about competition are fair, because that is vital to both shipyards.

Q5. Mr. Stott asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 8 April.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Stott: The Prime Minister is no doubt aware that in a letter replying to my hon. Friend the Member for Durham, North (Mr. Radice) she admitted that reports by Her Majesty's inspectors of schools indicated that at least one third of local education authorities in this country were vitally short of textbooks for the education of our children. Is that not an appalling record for someone who has been the Prime Minister of Britain for the last seven years?

The Prime Minister: If the hon. Gentleman reads that report in full he will find that a good deal of the problem is due to bad management of the resources. He has heard about the tremendous extra resources that the Government have made available per pupil for education. Expenditure per pupil is up by 16 per cent. over and above inflation and pupil-teacher ratios are at their best-ever level. With increasing resources per pupil, and an increasing number of teachers compared with pupils, there is good reason to expect that, if those resources are properly managed, education will be at a high standard.

Viscount Cranbourne: Will my right hon. Friend take time today to tell the House whether, in her opinion, there would have been an Anglo-Irish agreement if there had not been an IRA terrorist campaign?

The Prime Minister: There is an Anglo-Irish accord, and it must be implemented. It is intended to bring peace and stability to Northern Ireland. Obviously that requires the goodwill and active co-operation of decent men and women on both sides of the community. As Burke said, all that is required for evil to triumph is that good men do nothing. Now is the time for good men on both sides of the community to make their views known.

Q6. Mr. Redmond asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 8 April.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Redmond: What monetary price does the Prime Minister put on the pain and suffering of people who are waiting to go into hospital? Will the Government cut the waffle and put their money where their mouth is?

The Prime Minister: The number of nurses and doctors has increased considerably, the number of patients treated by the NHS has also considerably increased and the waiting lists have decreased. In 1979, when the Government were elected, expenditure on the NHS was £7·5 billion. This year it will be £17·5 billion.

Royal Ulster Constabulary

3.30 pm

Mr. Peter Archer (Warley, West) (by private notice) asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the safety of members of the RUC and their families.

The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Tom King): In the last month there have been 138 attacks on off-duty members of the RUC and the RUC Reserve, and their homes and families. The vast majority have taken place in predominantly Protestant areas. The whole House will wish to join me in condemning utterly these cowardly and disgraceful attacks on the men and women of the RUC who have given such loyal and courageous service to defend the Province against terrorism and to uphold law and order.

The Chief Constable, with the full support of the Police Authority for Northern Ireland and of the Superintendents Association and the Police Federation, has put arrangements in hand to provide quick and effective assistance to police officers and their families who are subject to attack or other forms of intimidation. Extra patrols are being mounted in vulnerable areas, and steps have been taken to provide suitable alternative accommodation for those unfortunate enough to have to move from their homes. In addition, the police are making strenuous efforts to bring the people responsible for this criminal behaviour to justice, and a considerable number have already been charged with serious offences associated with it.

I welcome the fact that the Churches and the more responsible political leaders have condemned without any qualification these outrages.

I look to the whole community to join together to defeat these acts of terrorism against its own police force, and to give every possible support to bring those responsible to justice.

Mr. Archer: Will the Secretary of State accept that we on these Benches join him in extending our sympathy to those officers and their families who have suffered attacks?

In recognising that violence of this kind against police officers and their families is deplorable from whatever political sector it comes, does the Secretary of State agree that it is condemned by the large majority of right-thinking people in the Unionist tradition? Will he invite those Unionist politicians who have not dissociated themselves from these attacks to make clear where they stand? Does he agree that the violence appears to stem from elements who once identified law and order with support for a particular political position, who expected the police to administer the law in a discriminatory way, and whose belief in law and order evaporated when they discovered that they too were subject to the law?

Does the Secretary of State share the view that at least some of those people have been and are involved in unlawful attacks on isolated Catholics? Will he join us in commending the stand taken by the Chief Constable in difficult circumstances in distinguishing between the freedom to march and demonstrate peaceably, and triumphalist marches calculated to provoke a disturbance?

I have two specific questions. First, does the Secretary of State agree that those who warned that plastic bullets were an unpredictable and dangerous method of crowd control and that their use was counter-productive have been shown by the tragic injuries to Mr. Keith White to have given sensible advice?

Secondly, will the right hon. Gentleman consider, with the Home Secretary, the suggestion made from the Opposition Front Bench by my hon. Friend the Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) during the debates earlier this year on the Public Order Bill that there should be a special scheme for quick and adequate compensation for policemen and others whose jobs involve a special risk of criminal injury and on whom we rely to form a front line in situations not of their own making?

Mr. King: I am grateful to the right hon. and learned Gentleman for his remarks. I immediately endorse one thing he said. I have no doubt that the overwhelming majority of people in the Province, regardless of their views about the Anglio-Irish agreement, are quite appalled by the attacks on the police. It is regrettable that some political leaders, some of whom sit in the House of Commons, have not yet felt able to condemn, without qualification, these attacks on the Royal Ulster Constabulary. One of the nastiest aspects of these attacks is that they are not just attacks on the police; there have also been nasty sectarian attacks that I know the House will deplore.

I have the greatest admiration for the Chief Constable, his senior officers and the RUC. Hon. Members may have heard that one such police officer who was attacked today, when asked in a radio interview this morning whether what had happened would undermine morale, said that it would only make the RUC stick together more closely as a family in their determination to stand against terrorism. They have stood together bravely for about 17 years and they will not stop now just because terrorism is coming from a different quarter. The whole House will respect them for that.

On the point made about plastic baton rounds, one understands the problems and difficulties involved, but at the same time the police face real problems when they are being stoned, as they were in Portadown. I am not prepared to see the police left quite defenceless against that sort of violence, although I very much regret injuries, even if they were caused to people who knew they were attending an illegal march, because that march had already been banned.

I would like to consider the point about compensation.

Sir John Biggs-Davison (Epping Forest): Must not all politicians on both sides of the water accept their responsibilities? Was it not forecast from these Benches that the result of the Anglo-Irish agreement would be to place this splendid force, whose families are also suffering so grievously now, between two fires? In the light of experience, will the Prime Minister seek to talk to the Taoiseach and, in view of the threat to the security of the whole of Ireland, seek an appropriate change of policy?

Mr. King: I very much hope that, in his remarks, my hon. Friend was in no way condoning the violence against the police. I am sure he would wish to be associated with any statement of condemnation of the fact that the RUC should be placed in that situation. Obviously, I recognise that many people in the Province, who have the strongest feelings about the Anglo-Irish agreement and who wish to argue about it, discuss it, and see how we can provide alternative approaches, would not dream of indulging in violence of any kind. I trust that we will respect that approach and no approach that espouses violence.

Obviously, we are most anxious — and the Prime Minister has made this clear — to enter into talks with Unionist leaders. We have just received a letter from the right hon. Member for Lagan Valley (Mr. Molyneaux) and the hon. Member for Antrim, North (Rev. Ian Paisley) expressing concern, and we shall respond to it shortly. I hope that it will be possible to have sensible talks, because it is by talking and not by violence that these problems must be solved.

Mr. J. Enoch Powell (South Down): Does the right hon. Gentleman remember that he and the Prime Minister were told in advance of the disastrous consequences that would inevitably ensue if they went ahead and made this agreement? What shall be done to the evil counsellors to whom they listened instead?

Mr. King: I am well aware of the right hon. Gentleman's feelings about this agreement. I had hoped that he would feel able to include in his remarks his condemnation of the violence shown to the RUC. That violence is regrettable, and I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will feel able even now to say so, even if in another place, and to make that known.

Sir Eldon Griffiths (Bury St. Edmunds): Why did certain elected Unionist Members approve the use of plastic baton rounds when they were directed at Sinn Fein mobs but objected to them when they were used against Loyalist mobs? Will my right hon. Friend explain to the House and to the men and women of the RUC why protection, for which requests were specifically made and which was specifically promised, was not forthcoming until after the petrol bombers had struck? Will my right hon. Friend explain that the arrangements being made now could not have been made when they were promised?

Mr. King: The first point is not a matter for me. It is for the Unionist Members of Parliament, or whoever my hon. Friend has in mind, to respond to that point. I have noted the comments elsewhere on that matter.

On the second point, I think that my hon. Friend is referring to a reply in this debate by an Under-Secretary of State to the effect that, if resources and help were needed and requested, they would be given. That is precisely what we are doing at the request of the Chief Constable. I have set out clearly in my statement ways in which, as soon as the threat emerged, steps were taken to meet it. I hope that I shall have my hon. Friend's full support—he has a particular interest in this matter—in ensuring that these co-operative efforts work as effectively as possible.

Mr. Merlyn Rees (Morley and Leeds, South): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that, like all his predecessors, he has every reason to praise the RUC for the way in which it has changed itself over the years from a Protestant force for a Protestant people, and I gladly do so?

In my view, the position is getting worse every day. The politicians do not count. Whatever the reason, the politicians dare not put their heads above the political parapet.

Will the right hon. Gentleman ask the Prime Minister —I offer this as a serious suggestion—to appear on the television and to talk to the people of Northern Ireland as Prime Minister and as leader of the Conservative and Unionist party? Will she explain to them that the people over there can take any view they like about the Anglo-Irish agreement—it is a political agreement—but that the RUC has become a British police force which is there for one reason—to uphold the laws on violence, which is what it is doing?

Mr. King: I have noted those comments, as has my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, especially in view of the right hon. Gentleman's experience and his years of service in the Province. Obviously we take those points seriously.

During the terms of office of the right hon. Gentleman and of other right hon. Members who have shared the post which I now have the honour to hold, more than 200 members of the RUC have laid down their lives in defence of the Province and of Protestants and Catholics against terrorism. They are entitled to the support of everyone in the Province and in the United Kingdom. If, as the right hon. Gentleman said, the politicians do not count any more, it is perhaps because it has not yet been possible to get talks or discussions going. This is a political matter and it is essential that it is discussed by politicians and is not tackled by men of violence, as is happening at present. That is why it is so important that we have early discussions.

Mr. Ian Gow (Eastbourne): Is my right hon. Friend aware that those Conservative Members who support him and those who opposed the Anglo-Irish agreement join him in condemning totally attacks on members of the RUC? Is he aware that, but for the Anglo-Irish agreement, this afternoon's statement would not have been made?

Mr. King: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his clear and unequivocal support of the condemnation of acts of violence. I hope that, in his last sentence, he did not imply that violence against the RUC could be justified. The RUC is seeking impartially to uphold the law and it is in the vital interests of every person in the Province that it should be able to continue to discharge that function. The community owes it to the RUC to give it support at this difficult time.

Mr. Stephen Ross (Isle of Wight): We would like to add our congratulations to the RUC. We recognise the courage which it is showing at this time. We also recognise the courage shown by the Secretary of State. We on these Benches much admire his responses and we hope that he will see the Anglo-Irish agreement through to its fulfilment because it is the only sane way forward in Northern Ireland.

Is protected accommodation being made available to members of the RUC who have not yet suffered any attacks? Can they move into such accommodation with their families if they so wish?

Mr. Tom King: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his opening remarks. I would rather not go into detail on the question of the arrangements that are being made for the RUC. There is close co-operation between the Chief Constable and the Superintendents Association and the Police Federation in this respect. They will certainly receive the fullest support from my office, and from the other security forces with anything that can be done to help.

Mr. Michael McNair-Wilson (Newbury): Further to the events in Portadown, and in view of the fact that the marching season has now begun in the Province and this year is likely to be more contentious than usual, is my right hon. Friend satisfied that the RUC has sufficient forces to cope with the parades? Will my right hon. Friend give due consideration to the Chief Constable's suggestion for an independent public tribunal to look into the routes of the parades? I beg my right hon. Friend not to put the RUC in a position where it is alienated from the support of either the majority or the minority.

Mr. King: My hon. Friend will be aware that the march which took place in Portadown was a non-traditional march. He will recall that last year, even before the Anglo-Irish agreement, violence had unfortunately taken place at Portadown when there was an attempt to re-route the march. When my hon. Friend makes such comments, I hope he will recognise the responsibility on others who wish to carry out the traditional and respected rights of marching and that they should not seek to do it deliberately in the most provocative and aggressive way through nationalist areas.

That has been part of the problem which has obviously concerned people in the past. I am very anxious that the marching season should be conducted without the strains that my hon. Friend has mentioned. Obviously responsibility falls on others to seek to arrange their business in the most appropriate way.

Mr. Roy Mason (Barnsley, Central): Is the Secretary of State aware that much of this violence must weigh heavily on the shoulders of the Unionist leaders, especially when hard-liners from their own ranks are turning against their own people? Is the Secretary of State further aware that firm leadership should now be given to stop this mass intimidation of the RUC and their families? It is about time that the Unionist leaders spoke out alongside the Secretary of State and his Ministers.

Mr. King: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman. He is held in respect for the firm leadership he has given on previous occasions. We shall give the RUC our fullest support. I certainly hope that the message which he has just delivered will be heard by others and that they recognise their clear responsibility.

Mr. Ivor Stanbrook (Orpington): Every responsible person, including every Member of this House, condemns violence, so do not let us waste any more time on that. When the Government decided to sign the Anglo-Irish agreement, was any assessment made of the scale and violence of the likely reaction among the majority population of Northern Ireland? If so, is my right hon. Friend really surprised at what has happened? If not, why not?

Mr. King: I am sure that my hon. Friend does not seek in any way to imply that violence can be justified. I hope that I will get his support about the need for discussions to take place. I understand his views on these difficult issues and I have made my own position absolutely clear in the past and my concern about the strength of the reaction. I hope that we can have talks, because that is the way to find a sensible and law-abiding way of resolving these difficulties.

Mr. John Hume (Foyle): Does the Secretary of State agree that the policemen in Northern Ireland who so clearly and in such difficult circumstances impartially upheld the rule of law in Northern Ireland last week deserve not just the support but the appreciation of the entire Northern Ireland community, but that those Loyalist Members who consistently come here to lecture the rest of us on law and order now stand exposed as to what they mean by law and order—they mean their law and their order?

Does the Secretary of State further agree that some hon. Members — I use the adjective "honourable" only because I am supposed to use it — are engaged in organising and encouraging the violence against the police in Northern Ireland in an outright campaign against the democratic process in order to create an atmosphere of fear in Northern Ireland so that decent people will not speak against it?

Finally, does the Secretary of State agree that the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) has presented himself for most of this century in the House as the upholder of the sovereignty of Parliament but that he abandoned that today, abjectly, and in so doing abandoned the rule of law?

Mr. King: Some hon. Members and some Unionist Members have stood up bravely and have unequivocally condemned the violence against the RUC, not without some risk to themselves, and I hope that the House respects them for that, but others have not felt able to do so. I note the hon. Gentleman's further comments about those who may be involved in organising or abetting. I shall not comment on that today, but the House will have noted the Chief Constable's remarks.

Mr. Henry Bellingham (Norfolk, North-West): Does my right hon. Friend agree that those who currently advocate an increase in the number of troops in Northern Ireland should listen carefully to the views of the Chief Constable who has made it clear that more troops should not be moved there at the moment?

Mr. King: The House will have noted the Chief Constable's comments, and I know that hon. Members will recognise, as did the right hon. Member for Barnsley, Central (Mr. Mason), the professionalism, competence and all-round ability of the RUC. It is an impressive police force. There is a real determination on the part of the Chief Constable and throughout the RUC to meet the challenge to prove that they can command and deal with this serious situation. Having said that, I make it clear that should additional resources be needed we would obviously seek to meet that, but, as my hon. Friend makes clear, that is not the Chief Constable's request at this time.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): What is the Secretary of State's reflection on the important question asked by the hon. Member for Dorset, South (Viscount Cranborne) of the Prime Minister, but unanswered by her, that, if it had not been for the activities of the IRA, would there have been an Anglo-Irish agreement at all?

Mr. King: I think that the hon. Gentleman took part in our debates on the Anglo-Irish agreement in which that point was discussed, along with the problems that have been posed in Northern Ireland over the years and the attempts to find a way to break the stalemate and to establish a form of local administration, or whatever word one uses for it, which could command widespread acceptance. The way in which the particular characteristics of Northern Ireland could be recognised in an effective form has defied solution, and the agreement was an attempt to break that stalemate in the interests of all the people in the Province, not in response to the problems of terrorism.

Mr. Barry Porter (Wirral, South): Will my right hon. Friend accept from me, as one of those who voted against the Anglo-Irish agreement, and, indeed, as somebody who has frequently spoken in the House in defence of loyalism, in the proper sense of that word, that I recognise, accept and applaud the views expressed by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and my right hon. Friend about the recent violence, but will he also accept that the patience of those of us who have supported and who will continue to support the Union is wearing thin and that, unless and until the leaders of the Unionist parties decide and express the view that the Union and the rule of law is utmost, the rule of the paramilitaries should be dismissed immediately by them?

Mr. King: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his remarks. My own views on the value and merit of the Union are clearly on the record, and I am determined to see that the Union is not put at risk. The tragedy is that those who shout loudest against the agreement and in any way associate themselves with the current forms of behaviour are those who represent a real risk to the Union.

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness and Sutherland): Does the Secretary of State agree that those politicians in the Province who seek to present the RUC as supporting a political settlement with which they are in disagreement are uttering a calumny upon the RUC whose sole role is to uphold the rule of law?

Mr. King: That is exactly the position. It is overwhelmingly in the interests of all the people in the Province to realise the need to respect the impartiality of the RUC in enforcing the law, whatever it may be.

Mr. Hugh Dykes (Harrow, East): At this testing time for the Government, will my right hon. Friend bear it in mind that he has the support of virtually the whole House? Is he not shocked that today one or two prominent politicians here have not unequivocally condemned the violence? Far from acceding to the ideas of the right hon. Member for Morley and Leeds, South (Mr. Rees)—in respect to the inference of his question, not of its substance—is it not the duty of Protestant politicians in Northern Ireland not to abdicate, as the right hon. Gentleman suggested, but to get out there, condemn the violence and support the Government's policy? In due course, after passing through this testing time, they will then have the courage of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State — perhaps even including, dare we guess it, that Jacques Soustelle, the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell).

Mr. King: The community in Northern Ireland at this time desperately needs leadership from every person in any position of responsibility. Everyone has that duty to lead. This is a dangerous and uncertain time; I make no secret of that. I will do what I can, and I feel entitled to look to every responsible person in the Province to play his part, too.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. We have a heavy day before us. We must move on.

Questions to Ministers

Mr. Giles Radice (Durham, North): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. In view of the confusion arising out of the Prime Minister's answer to a question by my right hon. Friend the Member for Islwyn (Mr. Kinnock) about the status of the advice sent out last week by the National Advisory Body to directors of polytechnics and colleges, and in view of the anxiety of the 9,000 well qualified young people who may be deprived of places in polytechnics and colleges in 1987-88, would it now be possible for the Secretary of State to answer question No. 15 on the Order Paper, which requests a statement on the National Advisory Board's 1987-88 planning exercise?

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry, but that will not be possible. We have passed beyond that point. I am sorry that that particular question was not reached, but we had a fairly long run on the matter.

Mr. Radice: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. Of course I accept your ruling, but my hon. Friends and I will press for the Government to make an early statement on the matter.

Mr. Stuart Bell (Middlesbrough): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker, and in response to the question that the Prime Minister answered, may I refer to the answer by the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education? I suggest that the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State unwittingly misled the House by stating that the Government had no responsibility either for the National Advisory Board or for the proposals sent yesterday to every college of further and higher education. That letter stated that there was a 7 per cent. cutback in students——

Mr. Speaker: Order. That sounds like an extension of Question Time. It is not a matter for me. I cannot be responsible for answers from the Government Front Bench.

Mr Bell: I respect what you say, Mr. Speaker, and I shall bring my point of order to the point. There is a constitutional relationship between what was said by the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State and the position of the Government. As I have indicated that the hon. Gentleman misled the House, would it not be appropriate for him to make an early statement rectifying that misleading statement?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not know whether the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State did so, unwittingly or not, but I am sure that he will have heard those comments.

Entry Refusals (Rights of Members)

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): I wish to raise a point of order of which I have given you notice, Mr. Speaker. It concerns the rights of hon. Members in connection with immigration matters, and I think that it is a matter directly for you.

Last Friday morning at 10 minutes past nine o'clock a visitor to this country was refused entry. A message was left with a relative of the sponsor, who is a constituent of mine. I was asked for my help at 10 o'clock. I immediately phoned the Home Office which made inquiries and rang back a few minutes later to tell me that it was impossible to accede to my request to stop the visitor's removal or for me to make representations on his behalf as he was already on a flight taking him to Pakistan. You will remember, Mr. Speaker, that immediately before the Easter recess we received assurances from the Home Secretary that every effort would be made to ensure that the guidelines concerning the rights of Members of Parliament in immigration matters would be exercised reasonably and flexibly to allow us an opportunity to exercise those rights. If the immigration authorities act as they did last Friday —which an official at the Home Office has described as "undue haste"—the immigration authorities will not be limiting the rights of hon. Members but removing them altogether.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I ask you to inquire urgently into the circumstances of this case and ask the immigration authorities and the Home Office to ensure that the period of time between refusing a visitor entry into this country and the removal of the visitor from this country is sufficient for our constituents to ask for our help and sufficient to enable us to give the help they are entitled to receive, but on this occasion were denied.

Mr. Speaker: I have allowed the hon. Gentleman to make his point, but it is not a matter for me. The operation of the immigration regulations is not a matter for the Chair.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The regulations are not a matter for the Chair.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. You will have noticed that during Question Time several matters were covered but, unfortunately, not the one to which I shall refer. During the recess there was mention of the alleged conspiracy of Gerry Gable, the editor of Searchlight, in which a Tory Member of Parliament was involved. Many of us had thought, quite properly, that during Question Time someone would have got round to raising that matter. In fact, my hon. Friend the Member for Battersea (Mr. Dubs) was only too anxious to catch your eye——

Mr. Speaker: Order. No hon. Member got round to that.

Mr. Skinner: I have an answer for it.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Gentleman probably has, but I cannot see that in any conceivable way it is a matter for me.

Mr. Skinner: I raise the point of order with you, Mr. Speaker, because it borders on the question of privilege of Members of Parliament. If there is the faintest possibility that the Prime Minister could be induced to answer questions on this matter later, we might get round to that question.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman should try his luck on Thursday.

Mr. Madden: Further to my point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I have nothing to add to what I have already told the hon. Gentleman. I allowed the hon. Gentleman to make his point, but it clearly was not a matter for me.

Mr. Madden: May I ask you to reflect, Mr. Speaker, on the fact that it is pointless and futile for us to have guidelines, which were debated in the House before Easter, giving hon. Members clear rights in immigration matters if those rights are to be obliterated by the immigration authorities? I believe that it is directly your responsibility.

Mr. Speaker: Order. It is certainly not my responsibility. It is the responsibility of the Government Department concerned. The hon. Gentleman must raise the matter with that Department.

Tin Mining (Cornwall)

4.4 pm

Mr. David Harris (St. Ives): I beg to ask leave to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No. 10, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the tin crisis in Cornwall, particularly the suspension of mining at Geevor".

I hope that I and my colleagues from Cornwall, particularly the hon. Member for Truro (Mr. Penhaligon) and my hon. Friend the Member for Falmouth and Camborne (Mr. Mudd), have said sufficient over the past weeks and months to convince you, Mr. Speaker, and the House of the specific nature of the crisis facing Cornwall and of the importance of that crisis for the county and for those who work in its tin mining industry.

I am afraid that during the recess the importance, seriousness and urgency of the matter has intensified dramatically, particularly a week ago when, unfortunately, Geevor mine in my constituency was forced to give notice to some 270 of its employees that they would be laid off at the end of last week.

It must have been one of the saddest days in the history of Cornwall when that took effect last Friday. It certainly had a tremendous impact on the whole of the county and, dare I suggest, even beyond the boundaries of the county, when the final shift came up from Geevor mine last Friday. The miners did not know whether they would ever return to the mine. Of course, whether they will return depends, in large measure, on the response to a submission today from the management of Geevor mine to the Government.

Here, I pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Department of Trade and Industry, who is in the House today, who was very good over the holiday weekend to take repeated telephone calls from me and listen to the urgent pleas I was making. However, the Government will now have to decide the fate of the mine and the fate of the tin industry in Cornwall.

In urging you, Mr. Speaker, to consider this matter as one of supreme urgency, I shall quote from the report of the Select Committee on Trade and Industry, which was published just as the House was going into recess before Easter. On the whole tin crisis the Committee said that if the Government

"waits for the tin price to settle before taking action, there will be no tin industry left in Cornwall".

The concluding paragraph of the report said:

"It is of supreme importance that the Government should begin negotiations with the industry on the possible types and amounts of aid and conclude them without delay. We believe that the Cornish tin industry is worth saving."

That is what the Select Committee said and that sentiment is echoed by everyone in the county of Cornwall and by many beyond it.

I urge you, Mr. Speaker, to consider giving leave to move for an emergency debate so that the House may discuss, without delay, the seriousness of the situation and particularly the plight of the miners.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Member for St. Ives (Mr. Harris) asks leave to move the Adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that he thinks should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the crisis in the Cornish tin industry following the suspension of mining at Geevor and the lay-off of 270 miners."

[Mr. Speaker]

I fully understand the concern that the hon. Gentleman has expressed, but I regret that I do not consider that the matter he has raised is appropriate for discussion under Standing Order No. 10. I cannot, therefore, submit his application to the House. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will find other ways of raising the matter.

Anglo-Hungarian Conductive Education Project

4.8 pm

Mr. Dave Nellist (Coventry, South-East): I beg to ask leave to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No. 10, for the purpose of discussing a specific matter of public importance that should have urgent consideration, namely,

"Government financial assistance for the Anglo-Hungarian conductive education project."

—[Interruption.] I am sure that Tory Members will find it even more amusing when they find out what the project is.

The matter is urgent and could not have been raised in Parliament before today because the extraordinary and moving documentary entitled "Standing up for Joe" was transmitted by the BBC only last Tuesday, 1 April. The hour-long film showed children with some of the severest physical handicaps — we shall have some more Tory laughter now — which led to extreme problems in controlling their body movements. In this country such children would receive care and compassionate treatment, but would be unlikely to make the breakthroughs shown in that film. The film showed children in Hungary who were wheelchair-bound at the beginning of their treatment at the Budapest clinic, and then showed them ice skating after two or three years of conductive education.

The matter is important because thousands of families watched that programme and within a couple of days of transmission the 1,000 information leaflets prepared for distribution had been used up. Those families were amazed at the improvement that conductive education could bring, because they had always thought that such improvements were beyond the capability of their children.

The tragedy is that the few dozen places available at the Petö clinic in Budapest for children from overseas, including those from my constituency in Coventry, presently receiving or hoping to receive treatment will be vastly oversubscribed as a result of the revelations of that documentary. The position will be exacerbated by agreements and visits agreed between the Hungarian institute, Japan and America, which will stretch the facilities beyond the reach of families in this country.

That brings me to the urgency of my request for a debate. This morning I learnt from the British Council that on 21 March the Government signed a cultural agreement with the Hungarian Government. It states:

"Both sides will encourage the conclusion of an agreement on co-operation between Birmingham University and the Teacher Training and Education Institute for the Motor Disabled."

That paragraph refers to a project to start in Birmingham a teacher training centre to bring the full benefits of conductive education to children and families in Britain — benefits which the Paymaster General and Minister for Employment saw on his visit in late 1984 and which, despite his encouraging words, have received no concrete or specific financial support from the Government. That project can begin in September only if, in the next few days, the Government find £250,000 to assist its establishment.

That sum, which is minute compared with other expenditure which the Government consider worth while, could be added to the £200,000 already promised by

Birmingham city council, the £200,000 given by Dr. Barnardo's and the £75,000 given by the Parkinson's Disease Society. The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Science, who is in the Chamber, said on 29 October 1985 that no funds were available from the Government. It could be done on a pound-for-pound basis, as the Government offered in 1981 in a press release entitled to assist the charities which have already raised £500,000.

"£1 for £1 to help mentally handicapped children"

The project could bring enormous and extraordinary benefits of conductive education to Britain and to the tens of thousands of families affected here. It is impossible in this short debate——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman has had four minutes. Will he bring his remarks to a close?

Mr. Nellist: It is impossible in such a short application to convey the full impact—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman asks leave to move the Adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that he believes should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the Government's financial assistance for the Anglo-Hungarian conductive educational project."

Mr. Nellist rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am on my feet. The hon. Gentleman knows that the rule is that three minutes are allowed for applications under Standing Order No. 10. I told the hon. Gentleman that he had already had four minutes, and I must now deal with the matter.

I listened with great care to what the hon. Gentleman said, and I hope that he will have further opportunities to raise this matter, but I regret that I do not consider that it is appropriate for discussion under Standing Order No. 10 and I cannot, therefore, submit his application to the House.

Mr. Nellist: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Could you or the Clerks tell me how much time the hon. Member for St. Ives (Mr. Harris) had to make his application? I was about 40 seconds away from finishing my application. This is the first time that I have seen you stop an hon. Member during his concluding remarks in an important application under Standing Order No. 10.

Mr. Speaker: This is the first occasion on which the time allowed has been exceeded. The hon. Member for St. Ives (Mr. Harris) spoke for just more than three minutes. I indicated to him that his time was up and he sat down. I warned the hon. Gentleman that he had spoken for four minutes. This is a rule of the House, not my rule.

Airports Bill

Mr. Alfred Morris (Manchester, Wythenshawe): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I shall be grateful for your guidance in relation to the Airports Bill. On the basis of advice from parliamentary counsel I submit that, in view of events during the Easter recess, there is a strong argument for holding that the Bill is hybrid and that, in accordance with the Standing Orders, it should be referred to the Examiners.

Manchester Airport plc is a company which commenced trading on 1 April. It has been set up to control the operation, development and management of Manchester airport. In law, the company is now an entirely independent trading company. It functions independently of the district councils and of local authority financial controls. As a result, Manchester Airport plc, unlike other airports affected by the Bill, can now raise money on the market in the normal way.

Clause 20 of the Airports Bill would apply to public airport companies the expenditure controls in the Local Government, Planning and Land Act 1980. That clause applies to advances and share issues made in respect of public airport companies which, as defined in clause 15(1) of the Airports Bill, includes airport companies whether or not formed under the powers proposed in the Bill. It appears, therefore, that, for the purposes of the Bill, Manchester Airport plc will be a public airport company. As a result it will become subject to local authority expenditure controls.

It is on that basis that I suggest that the Bill is now hybrid. As I understand the position, the effect of earlier decisions as to hybridity has always been that persons or bodies who were on equal terms before the passing of the Bill maintain an equality thereafter.

I have drawn your attention in a letter, Mr. Speaker, to precedents which have some relevance to this case—in particular, the Local Dues on Shipping Bill in 1856 and the Union of Benefices Bill in 1873—and will not detain the House about them this afternoon.

The true effect of the Airports Bill is that, if it is passed, other local authorities will be required to form public airport companies which will be under the same financial control as today while, by contrast, the Manchester company which now trades subject only to the constraints of company law will for the first time be subject to controls. The Bill will accordingly alter the status quo as between the Greater Manchester districts and other local authorities.

Finally, I must refer to the definition of hybridity by Mr. Speaker Hylton-Foster in connection with the London Government Bill in 1963. He defined a hybrid Bill as:

"a public Bill which affects a particular private interest in a manner different from the private interest of other persons or bodies of the same category or class."

It is widely felt that, on that definition alone, the Airports Bill is now hybrid. I do, of course, appreciate that the present case appears to be unprecedented and by definition, therefore, no previous ruling on hybridity may directly apply. That being so, I know that it may thus be difficult for you, Mr. Speaker, to rule on my point of order today.

Mr. Speaker: I thank the right hon. Gentleman for raising the matter, for sending me a letter, and for what he said on the point of order. I shall, of course, look carefully into the matter and rule on it tomorrow.

SCOTTISH AFFAIRS

Ordered,

That the matter of the development of the proposals for Scotland in the Green Paper on "Paying for Local Government", being a matter relating exclusively to Scotland, be referred to the Scottish Grand Committee for its consideration.—[Mr. Archie Hamilton.]

STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS, &c.

Ordered,

That the Metropolitan Roads Trunking Order 1986 (S.I., 1986, No. 153) be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.—[Mr. Archie Hamilton.]

Right to Interest

4.17 pm

Mr. Richard Ottaway (Nottingham, North): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to establish a legally enforceable right to interest on late payment of debts.

I repeatedly hear cries from Nottingham business men who say, "We have never had a better year for turnover, but we are still in danger of going broke," or, "If all our bills were paid, we would be millionaires, but we cannot recover the sums due." How many times have we heard those cries in industry today, especially in the smaller companies where cash flow represents one of the biggest problems? In a recent survey carried out by the Nottinghamshire chamber of commerce, firms were asked to name four factors which most limited their business prospects. After interest rates, the second on their list was cash flow.

Getting paid has always been a problem, but as money has got tighter in recent years it has become harder still. Any company which has survived the recession is reporting increased orders and a new wave of confidence, but the problems of getting paid are becoming worse. Long delays in payment are being experienced and the worst offenders seem to be large companies, which are making large sums from their capital reserves and which, because of their industrial muscle, can delay payment to smaller companies, which rely upon them for their business.

A classic example is a photographer who complained about advertising agencies for which he worked and which use excuses such as, "There is no sign of the invoice", or, "We cannot get at that invoice until the end of the month because it is in the computer." When it was in the filing cabinet, they got it within minutes. Loth as I am to tell tales against my party's advertising agency, I must say that he complained that, in his view, the main offender was the advertising agency Saatchi and Saatchi which, at the very earliest, only paid him some four months after the job.

The proposal enshrined in the Bill is that, no matter how long it takes to get paid, the party who has been out of pocket will be entitled to sue for interest. Incredibly there is at present no right to sue for interest on the late payment of a debt. A person can sue for interest if he commences proceedings before he is paid, but that means that the only way to be sure of receiving interest is to issue a writ with every invoice. That is hardly likely to lubricate the wheels of industry.

The Bill would give anyone a legally enforceable right to interest. That means that the right would not be confined just to business men but would apply to anyone who is owed money by, say, a Government Department. However, I am pleased to report that Government Departments and local authorities are, by and large, quite prompt about paying their debts. Critics of the proposal may suggest that it would be hard to define when the right to interest arose—a certain amount of leeway must be given to make a payment. I quite agree, and the proposal is that the right to interest arises 30 days after notice has been given of the intention to enforce the right. Enforcing the right would be easy, utilising the facilities of the county court, which has a jurisdiction of up to £5,000.

It may be said against the Bill that it is impinging upon a relationship between two contracting parties who could make a contractual relationship for interest if they so wished. As someone who is most concerned about individual rights, and about the rights of the individual rather than the collective, that is a criticism which I have considered carefully and rejected. The object of the Bill is to protect the small man against oppression from the large company. It is interesting to note that in a CBI survey only 19 per cent. said that they included a provision for interest in their contractual terms.

Why has there not been such a right to date? As long ago as 1978, the Law Commission, in its report on interest, concluded that the existing law did not provide adequate means of redress for the creditor who is kept out of his money by his debtor, and recommended that "the introduction of statutory interest is appropriate and necessary".

We are very much the odd man out in Europe. Only Ireland and the United Kingdom, with the exception of Scotland, do not have laws entitling creditors to interest on the withholding of a debt. In certain instances even Scottish law provides a right. There is even a precedent in English law in that the little used Uniform Laws on International Sales Act 1967 gives an entitlement to interest where the buyer delays payment in breach of contract. But that is not a general right.

It has been argued that a voluntary code is sufficient, but, although I would welcome a voluntary code, I cannot accept that it alone would be sufficient. Payment of interest, on a voluntary basis, has not worked during the past few hundred years, and I see no reason why it should work now. It is vital to put some statutory teeth into combating this problem.

It is said that industry does not want the measure, but that simply is not true. Since starting my campaign to introduce a right of interest I have received substantial support. I have the support of the Nottinghamshire chamber of commerce, the Institute of Directors and the small firms council of the CBI. The full council of the CBI is actively considering the proposal and I hope that it will shortly be giving its support to it. The CBI recently carried out a survey on the late payment of trade debt among small firms. Among the questions asked was

"If there was a right to interest do you think you would ever use it?"

Of those asked, 44 per cent. said yes, which included a yes answer from 67 per cent. of the construction industry. But more interesting still is the fact that when asked a staggering 85 per cent. answered yes.

"If you were automatically entitled, by law, to interest on any debts paid late, do you think your customers would pay more promptly?"

To me, that shows that the mere existence of a right to interest would result in the faster payment of bills without the need to refer to the courts. That must be an utterly desirable objective, and I commend the Bill to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Richard Ottaway, Mr. Patrick Nicholls, Mr. Andrew Rowe, Mr. Michael Grylls, Mr. Michael Fallon, Mr. Michael Forsyth and Mr. Michael Knowles.

RIGHT TO INTEREST

Mr. Richard Ottaway accordingly presented a Bill to establish a legally enforceable right to interest on late payment of debts: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon 9 May and to be printed. [Bill 127.]

Orders of the Day

Dockyard Services Bill

As amended (in the Standing Committee), considered.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. You may recall that before the Easter recess I raised a point of order about the Bill being read today, prior to the Public Accounts Committee being able to produce its report on the control of dockyards, their operation and manpower. On Monday 10 March 1986, the PAC took evidence in relation to such matters, and in both public and private sessions matters were raised—certainly in private session—that would affect the tabling of amendments and their potential selection.

Is it not unreasonable of the Government to insist on the Report stage and Third Reading of the Bill today in the knowledge that the PAC report has not been published? Does that not represent an interference with our proceedings, and is there not an argument for suggesting that proceedings on the Bill should be suspended pending the report's publication, so as to ensure the widest and most informed debate possible?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Gentleman knows that I am not responsible for Bills that are brought forward by the Government. I had no difficulty in selecting amendments which were submitted and which appear on the Amendment Paper.

Mr. Martin J. O'Neill (Clackmannan): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. On 11 February Standing Committee D discussed the Bill and the Minister of State said:

"We have made it clear that a draft of the contract with the private contractor will be made available to the House. Many of the draft contract conditions, the 73 annexes for example, will be set out in the invitation to tender documents, of which we will make as much as possible available." — [Official Report, Standing Committee D, 11 February 1986; c. 489.]

The documents were placed in the Library at 3 pm today. They are extensive, and it could be suggested that the three and a half hours that it took for them to be delivered from the Ministry of Defence was due to the fact that the clerk could not carry them more quickly. The information would have been extremely helpful to those participating in the debate. Although the Minister has been as good as his word, he has not carried out the spirit of his remarks. Will you consider that point, Mr. Speaker?

Dr. David Owen (Plymouth, Devonport): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. I have just been to the Library and have examined the documents. As has been said, they are compendious. There are three volumes, which are seven or eight inches thick. There is also an extraordinarily interesting document which is relevant to this debate. I refer to the report of Fuller Peiser, on the scheduling and valuation of assets; the stage one report on Devonport dockyard, and volume two.

We are dealing with this whole question today. Are you prepared, Mr. Speaker, to urge the Government to postpone the Report stage and Third Reading? It is intolerable that we should suddenly receive such information at this late hour. Will you do your best to change the business of the House to allow these important documents to be studied and examined?

Mr. Speaker: Those are matters for the Leader of the House. I think that we must now proceed.

New Clause 1

REPORT ON COSTS AND SAVINGS ARISING FROM PROVISION OF DOCKYARD SERVICES

'The Secretary of State shall set out and itemise in a report to be laid before each House of Parliament all the costs and savings in excess of £100 incurred by and owing to the Exchequer from any arrangements made in consequence thereof for the provision of designated dockyard services by any company or companies'.—[Mr. Denzil Davies.]

Brought up, and read the First Time.

Mr. Denzil Davies (Llanelli): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

My hon. Friend the Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) raised an important point of order and rightly said that the Bill's Third Reading should not be debated until we have received the report of the Public Accounts Committee, which inquired into costs. We quite understand why the Government are concerned not to have to say too much about the costs and possible savings that will result from the Bill.

4.30 pm

In the 24th sitting of Standing Committee D on 13 March the Under-Secretary made an extraordinary statement which is germane to the point of order raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Workington:

"The Government's plans are about more than profit and loss. I shall not follow the right hon. Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies) down the path that he took on costings. It is not relevant to the Bill."

I should have thought that costings were germane and basic to the Bill. The cost to taxpayers should be part of the whole investigatory function of the House. The Under-Secretary also said:

"the House will be able to debate on Third Reading the policy issues, including questions of costings on which the Public Accounts Committee may by then have reported."—[Official Report, Standing Committee D, 13 March 1986; c. 777.]

Of course the Public Accounts Committee has not reported. As my hon. Friend said, we would have been in a much better position to debate the Bill if we had had the report of the Public Accounts Committee.

I understand why the Minister of State and the Government Whips want the Bill to proceed. Costings are very embarrassing for the Government. The Minister of State may deny this, but it seems to be clear that there will be no savings to the Ministry of Defence. As we have said from Second Reading onwards, this ill-considered and highly speculative Bill will cost the Ministry of Defence and the defence budget money. Therefore, I can understand why the Government are happy that the Bill should be debated today before the publication of the Public Accounts Committee's detailed report.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Having seen all the documents, may I point out to my right hon. Friend that it is impossible for the House to consider the Bill unless hon. Members see the figures that were presented to the Public Accounts Committee?

Mr. Davies: My hon. Friend has seen the figures and I have not. We shall have to do the best we can with the various statements from Ministers. Indeed, last week a civil servant in the Ministry of Defence held a fairly late press conference, no doubt hoping that the press would not pick up some of the things he said. That civil servant made it clear that there would not be any saving and that the budget of the Ministry of Defence would suffer because of the Bill.

Mr. Dick Douglas (Dunfermline, West): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I apologise for raising the matter in the House but I have just been to the Library and I have here the only documents that are available to the House. These are the articles of association of the companies which the Government propose to set up under the Bill. I have here the only copies that are available to the Library. I have also got copies of the document which was referred to by the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen). These, too, are the only copies that are available to the Library.

While I respect the difficulty you are in, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I do not think it was right that the documents should have been presented at the end of a recess. If they had been available at the beginning of the recess hon. Members would have had the opportunity to discuss them and to put down amendments. Opposition Members pressed time and time again in Committee for the articles of association and other documents to be made available. For the documents to be placed in the Library at this late hour is an abuse of the Government's position and shows arrogance on their part. They had plenty of time to make the documents available sooner.

I am in training for the London marathon but not for lifting these documents. I can hardly carry them. As I have said, these are the only copies available. I urge you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, to consider the matter with the Clerks and perhaps to ask for a business statement from the Leader of the House on the suspension of the sitting so that hon. Members may have an opportunity to examine these documents.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): I can only reiterate what Mr. Speaker has said. That is a matter of complaint against the Government; it is not a matter for me in the Chair.

Mr. Davies: The points made by my hon. Friend are again indicative of how ill-thought out, how ill-considered and how ill-prepared the Bill is.

Mr. Michael Foot (Blaenau Gwent): Further to the point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. A most serious point has been made by my hon. Friend the Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) and others. Can we not have a statement from the Government? I fully understand that it is not in your power to change the proceedings that have been put down, but it is certainly within the power of the Minister who is supposedly in charge of the Bill to get up and make a statement. He could be asked to make a statement and to give some explanation. If he cannot give an explanation to the House, it is utterly intolerable that the Bill should proceed in these circumstances. I urge that an opportunity be given to a spokesman for the Government to make a statement about the complaints.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I am sorry to press the matter but my right hon. Friend the Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot) has raised a point in addition to the points that were raised earlier by my hon. Friends. My hon. Friend the Member for Dunfermline, West (Mr. Douglas) brought documents to the Chamber after Mr. Speaker had given his former ruling. This was new evidence in support of the case for the suspension of the sitting. In the light of the new information, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I wonder whether you would suspend the sitting for 15 minutes to examine whether there has been an abuse of our proceedings in so far as it is unreasonable and unfair to place a responsibility on hon. Members to consume all the information that is available in those documents prior to being able to debate the Bill responsibly.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I have listened carefully and understand the concern of hon. Members, but this is not a matter for me. The complaint is against the Government. I have no doubt that the Minister has heard it and will reply in due course.

Mr. Denzil Davies: Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The Minister of State owes the House at least an explanation why these important tender documents — I understand that we have not got the articles of association — arrived in the Library only a short time ago. It is extremely difficult for hon. Members to consider them. As well, we have not got the report of the Public Accounts Committee. I appreciate that Ministers did not give an assurance on that, but it is difficult for us to debate the new clauses without the PAC report, without having had time to consider the documents that are now available and without the articles of association which are germane to new clause 2. In view of the time the Government had to prepare the Bill, the time it was in Committee and the fact that there was the Easter Adjournment, we should expect a statement from the Minister of State at least as to why it has taken so long to make the documents available in the Library.

The Minister of State for Defence Procurement (Mr. Norman Lamont): If I may intervene, I must point out that documents were made available on 3 April only to the companies interested in tendering. This has been the first opportunity since then when the documents could be made available to the House. The choice of business for the first day was discussed through the usual channels. The documents could not have been made available to the House before today. Of course, I accept that the right hon. Gentleman is making a serious point, but we are discussing the principles of the Bill. I appreciate that he would have liked to have had the documents earlier but there is no way in which they could have been made available to the House sooner.

Mr. Davies: That really will not do. It is all very well for the Minister of State to say that the companies had the documents only on 3 April and so this was the first opportunity on which they could be made available to the House. The Government could have postponed today's consideration of the Bill. It is no good saying that the Government's business managers brought the Bill on today. The Ministry of Defence is in charge of the Bill. The Minister of State could have said to the Government's business managers, "We cannot have this Bill on Tuesday because on Tuesday I shall be delivering in a pantechnicon or whatever these enormous documents to the Library of the House and I want to make sure that hon. Members have time to read the documents before the debate takes place." The primary responsibility for putting the Bill through the House lies with the hon. Gentleman. It is no good the hon. Gentleman trying to hide behind the Government's business managers. He should have said, "Postpone the Bill for a week," and that would have happened.

Dr. Owen: Further to the point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. There may be some misunderstanding because the documents which I have relate only to Devonport, and there is only one copy. The copies that the right hon. Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies) referred to relate to Rosyth. We are discussing both dockyards, in which we have a considerable interest, and the only documents available are the contractual tenders. When the Minister of State and, more important, the Secretary of State reflect on this, they must realise that we are in an intolerable position because new clause 1 relates to financial assets and costs and the Government's judgments about the effects and consequences for the defence budget.

We could help the Minister out. We are reasonable people. If we could have a suspension of an hour or two, the business of the House would be expedited. The danger in the Government not giving way is that we may have to resort to the traditional weapon available to all Oppositions. We have been most reluctant to use that weapon as none of us wishes to filibuster.

Mr. Gordon Brown (Dunfermline, East): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Are you aware that the Minister of State's statement does not fully accord with the facts available to me? He has given us the impression that these documents were put in the Library on the earliest possible occasion. When I telephoned the Ministry of Defence this morning to ask that these documents be made available immediately, I was told that it was under instructions not to place them in the Library until 2.30 this afternoon. When I went to the Library at 2.30 pm, the documents had not arrived and I had to remind the Ministry about them. The documents arrived at 3 pm, so the Minister of State's statement that he did everything possible to make them available at the earliest opportunity does not accord with the timetable of events that has led to this sorry state of affairs this afternoon.

The Minister of State was asked specifically in a written question before Easter to delineate the costs involved in the Government's dockyards privatisation scheme. He replied that he would write to me as soon as possible. We are now debating new clause 1, but there has been no reply. The Leader of the House should come to the House to make a statement about why official business has been affected by the Ministry of Defence's reluctance to bring vital documents to the House.

Mr. Douglas: Further to the point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I must apologise to the House because, in my eagerness, I brought not the articles of association, but the tender documents. To the best of my knowledge, we do not have the articles of association of these companies. Nevertheless, it is very clear to all who have eyes to see and ears to hear that we are most disturbed at the method and approach adopted by the Government.

I suggest, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that you consider whether it is in order to suspend the sitting until the Leader of the House is available to make a statement on the business of the House and to decide whether we should proceed, in view of the difficulties in which we have been placed by the Government's mismanagement.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. You may recollect that this is not the first occasion in this Session when Ministers have engaged in such parliamentary hanky-panky. You will recall that, during the debates on the Westland affair, the text of the Solicitor-General's letter was promised by the Leader of the House. When we went to the Library, we found that it was there, but under embargo on the orders of a higher authority—which later turned out to be 10 Downing street—that it should not be released.

Some of us believe that the heart of the Leader of the House is often in the right place. He said that the full text of the Solicitor-General's letter, and not the selective text leaked for political purposes, should be made available before the debate on Westland. Should we not wait, Mr. Deputy Speaker, until the arrival of the Leader of the House, who has previously proved himself to be relatively enlightened and has put the House of Commons before party political interests?

Mr. Foot: Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The Secretary of State for Defence has now arrived and he will have heard the strong sense of dismay that has been expressed in many parts of the House on this matter. He must recognise that he has a responsibility. It is open to him to move that the sitting be suspended for 10 minutes, or to get agreement to that. I am not suggesting that that would solve the problem, as the House has a right to study the documents.

The Government's statement has only made matters worse. It would be intolerable if the House were asked to discuss the Bill when there is confusion about the availability of documents and the form in which they have been presented. I urge the Minister to communicate with the Leader of the House. The proceedings here are his responsibility. The Secretary of State for Defence also has a responsibility, and he should announce that he will send at once for the Leader of the House to come to the House's aid to get our business in proper order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Perhaps I can help the House. I have listened carefully to the strong representations that have been made on the point of order, but the complaint is against the Government and not a matter for the Chair. I see no reason why we should not pursue our discussion of new clause 1. The Secretary of State and others have heard the point of order. It is for the House to decide how it will get the information that it requires. It is not a matter for me.

Mr. O'Neill: Further to the point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I think that, with respect, you are not in full possession of the facts. The volumes are the Ministry of Defence royal dockyards invitation to tender for the operation and management of Her Majesty's dockyards at Devonport and Rosyth. We have so far skated around the nature of the documents. If we are to be in any position to consider the Bill, we have to have an opportunity to reflect on those documents.

The two substantial documents beside me relate only to Rosyth dockyard. I think that the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen) would not regard it as disrespectful of me to say that he filched the documents relating to Devonport from the Library without the permission of the Librarian. The dockyard is in his constituency, but we were not allowed to take the documents out of the Library. My hon. Friend the Member for Dunfermline, West (Mr. Douglas) requested and was subsequently granted the loan of the Rosyth documents.

We are discussing three substantial volumes, one of which is complex, to say the least. Its contents are set out in indexes which run to some four pages. The information might seem somewhat arcane to the hon. Member for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat-Amory) who participated virtually not at all in Committee, but some of us became students of the publications of Touche Ross, albeit only those which were made freely available. Some were not made available in Committee as there was a cloak of secrecy masquerading as commercial confidentiality which prevented our seeing the documents.

We could get through this pile of memorandums fairly quickly, as most of us know our way around the dockyards, having spent some 70 hours debating them in Committee. That is all the more reason to be given a reasonable amount of time to consider the documents.

This is not an attempt at filibustering. We are anxious to make progress. However, the Government's managers should appreciate the difficulties under which not only Opposition Members but Conservative Back Benchers will labour today unless there is an adjournment during which we can look at these documents. I admit that that will be very difficult, because there is only one copy. However, if we could have a 30-minute adjournment it could be split up between those Opposition Members who served on the Standing Committee and looked at very carefully.

Surely there is a mechanism whereby the Leader of the House, the Government's business manager, can be summoned to the Chamber to explain why the Government have allowed the Ministry to deal with hon. Members in such a disrespectful manner. There ought to be a mechanism whereby the rights and responsibilities of the Government can be questioned in this Chamber. You as our protector, Mr. Deputy Speaker, should be able to bring the Leader of the House to the Chamber and ask him to provide an explanation for an action that is leaving an extremely sour taste in the mouths of, I think, all hon. Members, certainly in those of Opposition Members.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Let me remind the House that all that is happening at the moment is that new clause 1, which was tabled by the Opposition, is being proposed. I see no reason at all why we should not continue to discuss new clause 1. If the usual channels, or any other hon. Members, want to make representations to each other, that is another matter, but it is not a matter for me. I see no reason why we should not continue to discuss new clause 1.

Mr. Dalyell: Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I am wondering whether this is symptomatic of the difficulties that the Leader of the House may have with the Ministry of Defence. It will be within your recollection that on 25 March, at column 865, I raised in detail and at some length the case of Mr. Jim Smith, a whistle blower at the Ministry of Defence——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order——

Mr. Dalyell: —on which my hon. Friend the Member for (Workington) (Mr. Campbell-Savours) has done so much work.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am on my feet. I do not see the relevance of that point of order.

Mr. Dalyell: The relevance of that point of order is to be found in column 879 when the Leader of the House said:

"I shall look at the points made by the hon. Member for Linlithgow about Jim Smith and shall get in touch with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence. I understand the analogy the hon. Gentleman drew with the pit prop case in the 1960s and 1970s."

I then asked him:

"Will the right hon. Gentleman raise James Smith's case with the Treasury?"

The Leader of the House said:

"Yes, certainly."—[Official Report, 25 March 1986; Vol. 94, c. 879.]

Since then I have heard nothing. I am wondering whether the Leader of the House stands in too much awe of the Ministry of Defence. These are matters on which he ought to be in a position to tell the Ministry, whatever the pecking order may be, what it ought to be doing.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am even more convinced now that the hon. Gentleman's contribution is not relevant to the discussion of new clause 1.

Mr. John McWilliam (Blaydon): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. As you rightly said, the fixing of the business of this House is a matter for the Leader of the House, but that is not what we are discussing. We are discussing documents that have been laid in the Library of this House. The assumption is that those documents are available to all hon. Members. Since the only copy is lying down there at the Dispatch Box, it is patently not the case that all hon. Members had an opportunity to see the documents before this debate began. Ministers have seen those documents and copies have been laid in the Library, but my hon. Friends and I have not yet had an opportunity to see them. The contents of those documents are germane to the debate.

My hon. Friend the Member for Clackmannan (Mr. O'Neill) raised a point that is germane to new clause 1. We are asking that the House should be adjourned for 15 minutes so that the advice of the Leader of the House can be sought about how to proceed. I do not know how we can continue with this debate since we have been unable to consider properly the information that is contained in those documents. It will be impossible to consider the amendments without having had an opportunity to study them. The Minister chose to lay those documents in the Library. It was his choice. If he had chosen not to do so it might have been possible to continue with this debate. However, as he chose to lay those documents in the Library he will undoubtedly say that the information is there, although we have had no opportunity to study it. Therefore, both sides of the House are being put in an unfair position.

I agree that it is the duty of the Leader of the House to fix the business of the House but it is for the Chair to determine whether a debate can properly and fairly take place. Information has been made available and placed in the Library of the House and all hon. Members must, in justice, be given an opportunity to study it, otherwise the matter cannot properly be debated.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I have listened carefully to that lengthy point of order. It merely reiterates what has already been said. The complaint is against the Government. I have said already on four or five occasions that it is not a matter for me.

Mr. Douglas: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. I have great respect for your views and constitutional knowledge and for the guidance that we receive but, with great respect, you keep reiterating that the complaint is against the Government and that it is not a matter for you. However, I ask you to reflect upon the need to defend the rights of hon. Members. We are discussing the Report stage, and we will presumably also debate the Third Reading of a four clause Bill. It is an enabling Bill. In order to put flesh upon it, the Government, in their wisdom, or otherwise, have provided information to the House regarding their intentions.

During the Committee stage, the Government produced a large number of documents, to some of which hon. Members have access, including volume 1 of the Touche Ross report. There was also access, on a restricted basis, to volumes 2 and 3. The documents that were placed in the Library today are either important or unimportant. The Government thought that they were so important that they placed them in the Library. In order to protect the interests of the House, hon. Members are entitled to ask for your support, Mr. Deputy Speaker, in seeking an opportunity to examine the documents.

The Bill was amended in Standing Committee D. It says:

"Ordered, by the House of Commons, to be Printed, 18 March 1986."

It also says:

"Presented by Mr. Secretary Heseltine . . . Mr. Secretary Brittan."

Neither of them now holds office. This point ought, perhaps, to have caught my eye earlier, but I ask you now to pronounce on the authenticity of the document and to say whether it is in order that the names of the right hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine) and the right hon. and learned Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Brittan) should appear on the face of the Bill as presenting it for Report and Third Reading since they no longer hold the positions set out on the face of the Bill. Therefore, the Bill that is now before the House is not in my view accurate.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: As far as the presentation is concerned, as the hon. Member knows, the names mentioned were those of the Ministers who presented the Bill in the first place. I understand the concern but, if we are talking about protecting Members, and so on, it is in their best interests to allow the right hon. Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies) to propose the new clause. The exchanges have been heared and I have no doubt that, according to custom, all sorts of other exchanges will take place. I see no reason at all why we should not get on with new clause 1, which has been tabled by the Opposition and which the hon. Member wants to propose.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. You say that you "can see no reason at all". Perhaps I could give you the reason why, in my view, the Bill cannot possibly proceed.

My hon. Friend the Member for Dunfermline, West (Mr. Douglas) made an important point. He said that he had contacted the Ministry of Defence this morning about documents which were to be placed in the Library and had been informed that those documents would not be available, to use his words, until early this afternoon. The Minister states that he had them made available at the earliest possible opportunity. There is a contradiction there, unless the Minister can explain to the House that there was a reason why those documents, which were published and which we can see here, were not made available this morning when my hon. Friend sought them.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I may join in deploring conduct, and so on, but what the Minister said or did not say is not for me. It is not a matter for me as far as the proceedings this afternoon are concerned.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Further to my point of order, I would say that indeed it is a matter for the Chair in so far as the Minister has indicated to the House what his intention was because his actions do not fit his intentions. Yet his actions have a direct bearing on the ability of Members to debate this matter.

Further to that, Mr. Deputy Speaker, may I refer you to the undertaking given by the Minister in Standing Committee D on 13 March. He said:

"The Government's plans are about more than profit and loss. I shall not follow the right hon. Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies) down the path that he took on costings."

The crucial word is "costings", because we have a whole series of amendments which deal, as I understand it, with that matter. The Minister went on:

"It is not relevant to the Bill. But, as I said last Tuesday, the House will be able to debate on Third Reading the policy issues, including questions of costings".

Then he said, as an addendum to his statement,

"on which the Public Accounts Committee may by then have reported." — [Official Report, Standing Committee D, 13 March 1986; c. 777.]

It was clear at that stage during the course of the Committee's proceedings that the Minister's way of dealing with the amendments was to draw attention to the fact that when those matters were to be debated on the Floor of the House there would be information available to Members of the House. That information is not available. In other words, the Minister effectively misled the Committee into believing that information would be made available. He may shake his head, but the record is there in Hansard. It is very clear from what he said that he intended that information on the question of costings to be made available to the House. It is not available, and it is on that basis——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member may feel that the Minister has not honoured certain undertakings, but that is a matter for debate; it is not a matter for me. I really think that we ought to get on and proceed with new clause 1.

Mr. Denzil Davies: Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. My hon. Friend the Member for Dunfermline, West (Mr. Douglas) made a very important point when he said that he was told by an official at the Ministry of Defence that he could not see the documents until 2.30 this afternoon. In view of that statement, we need to be told by the Minister of State whether that was indeed the case.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That is a matter for the Minister of State; it is not a matter for me.

Mr. Davies: But it does affect the conduct of this debate because we are raising points of order that relate to documents that really should have been made available to the House before now. This is a four-clause Bill. It is a piece of enabling legislation. Most of the legislation—if I can use that word—takes place outside the Bill. It takes place in contracts, articles of association, invitations to tender, reports made by management consultants such as Touche Ross. It takes place in reports that we were not allowed to see in the Committee, that even hon. Members for constituencies where the dockyards are located, Rosyth and Plymouth, Devonport, were not allowed to see. This is an unusual Bill in that it does not contain much of the information that is needed to debate the Bill.

New clause 1 deals with costings, new clause 2 deals with foreign ownership, new clause 3 deals with redundancy payments. Many of these matters are dealt with in these very documents. The document about the scheduling and valuation of assets is crucial to new clause 1. It is not possible to determine whether there will eventually be profit or loss until we know what the value of the assets is. New clause 1 calls for a balance sheet, a report before the House of Commons. Without some kind of indication from the Government this is not possible.

The business of the House was determined in respect of this Bill before the Easter vacation. The agreements were made then. There was plenty of time from the beginning of the vacation to last week for these documents to be placed in the Library of the House. So I think that the Minister should tell us whether there was a policy decision that these documents were commercially confidential and could not be allowed into the Library of the House before the last minute, that they must be treated like quasi-secret budget documents. That is the issue at stake.

This Bill is open-ended. There is no guillotine on it. There was no guillotine in Committee. Therefore, it is quite possible for this debate to continue for most of today and, indeed, into tomorrow. There is no pressure of time.

What we are asking is that consideration be given to allowing an adjournment to enable us to look at these documents—documents which appeared in the Library of the House only 30 minutes before this debate was scheduled to take place. This would give us an opportunity to study them and see how germane they are to the new clauses we are debating. Then perhaps we could come back and start debating those clauses. We are merely asking for time to enable us to debate these new clauses properly.

Mr. Foot: Further to the points of order that have been put to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I certainly appreciate, as I think every Member of the House appreciates, the difficulty in which you are placed because you are asked to deal with a matter that is primarily a question for the Government.

This is an extraordinary state of affairs. We have had one short intervention from the Government when these points of order were being raised on matters concerning the proper conduct of this debate. We now have an unprecedented state of affairs. The Secretary of State in charge of the Bill looked in for a few minutes, but then he skedaddled; he seems to have gone off. He is not taking any responsibility although his name is certainly on the back of the Bill, whatever names have been removed. For the Secretary of State for Defence to look in for a few minutes, see that there is some trouble over a Bill for which he is primarily responsible and then run away is, I think, appalling.

We also had for a minute or so the presence of the Patronage Secretary. He should know what the situation is.

It is intolerable that the Government should think that they can continue with this Bill without the Leader of the House being brought here to say how we are to proceed upon it. For the very reason that you have underlined, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that you are put in such difficulties in the matter, I think it behoves the Minister himself to make a fresh statement. Surely he must understand that the Bill cannot properly be discussed in the circumstances in which he has presented it to the House of Commons. It is to him and to the Government that our main demands are made. We believe that the Government should take the procedural step of asking for an adjournment of the House. If that happened, matters could proceed in an orderly fashion.

Dr. Owen: Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. In the time that has elapsed during this discussion, it has become clear that the draft memorandum and articles of association of the dockyard company have been submitted to the House through annexe 4.1 to this document. Therefore, the third crucial document is available, although only in draft form, in an annexe to the tendering documents. That is a further argument on which the Government should reflect.

It is extraordinarily difficult to discuss the Bill and the corporate structure of the dockyards without having considered the articles of association which in Committee the Minister made clear he hoped to publish. The draft documents are now available, although I have not yet been able to get hold of the annexe in the time available to me. I assure the House that they were not filched, but given with the full authorisation of the lady librarian to me in my capacity as a constituency Member in order to carry out what we hope will be a serious examination of the legislation.

As the right hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot) said, you are in an extremely difficult position, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Everyone is aware that this is not a decision for you, and that we are having to use this procedural device to draw attention to the Government's problem. It would help us greatly if the Minister or the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State would come to the Dispatch Box and explain how we should proceed.

The right hon. Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies) made it clear that he conducted the business in Committee, ably assisted by my hon. Friend the Member for Portsmouth, South (Mr. Hancock), through consent. There were no problems and there was no timetabling. We are not in a mood to create difficulties for the Government. If they wish to reintroduce the matter on another day, the business of the House can be proceeded with on an arranged basis. I am a little sceptical about a short adjournment because the more we look at the documents, the longer we shall need to consider them. Business could be arranged through the usual channels. I understand that there is an order on general practice expenses to be debated after this matter, and the House could well examine it. It is not as if all the Government's business would fall if this business were withdrawn.

In that spirit, we should like the Minister to answer. You, Mr. Deputy Speaker, have valiantly sought to direct the attention to the Government, but, as yet, the Minister has not felt able to come to the Dispatch Box, apart from his rather short interjection. If the Minister will explain how he intends to proceed, I am sure that we would all be grateful. We should like to hear how he anticipates proceeding. Otherwise, this will take rather a long time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am sure that an adjournment of 15 or 20 minutes would satisfy nobody. I have listened carefully and we have had a long time for substantial representations to be made. They have been made strongly, and a period of reflection has undoubtedly been made available to Government Members. I do not wish to take any further points of order on this matter. I have heard all that I want to hear. I am sure that we should proceed with new clause 1, and then we shall hear the Minister's reply.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: I beg to move, That strangers do withdraw.

Notice being taken that strangers were present, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER, pursuant to Standing Order No. 136 (Withdrawal of strangers from House), put forthwith the Question, That strangers do withdraw:—

Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. Donald Thompson and
Mr. Francis Maude.

Question accordingly negatived.

Mr. Denzil Davies: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The House has voted, and I understand that the Leader of the House is fairly close to the Division Lobbies. I now seek a statement from him about why the Government placed these important documents in the Library of the House less than one hour before the debate was due to take place. I remind the House that we are discussing a four-clause Bill; indeed, three of those clauses are little longer than two or three lines. We are debating enabling legislation, and this House has traditionally been suspicious and most concerned about such legislation.

The background to this is that, until numerous documents are studied, it is extremely difficult for the House to debate fully the difficult questions involved. As one example, I refer to the cost of privatising the royal dockyards. One document placed in the Library but half an hour before the debate was due to start sets out a schedule of the assets which will still be held by the Ministry of Defence but the use of which will be given to the private contractor to enable that contractor to operate the dockyards. The valuation placed on those assets and the cost of their use is absolutely crucial in determining questions of profit and loss.

The first new clause is concerned with striking a balance sheet and determining for the benefit of this House and the taxpayer whether the whole operation will result in a loss or gain of money to the taxpayer. Without studying that document, without being able to see what assets will be allowed to be used, leased or granted by licence to the private contractor, and without seeing what price will be put on these obligations, it is impossible for this House to consider new clause 1.

New clause 2 is concerned with foreign ownership of the dockyards and with the share structure of the different companies. I am told that two, three or four consortia of companies are involved. Again, the share structure of these companies is involved, and the key issue is whether the Government have been able to obtain for themselves the "golden share" control, as used in previous privatisation Bills, because this Bill contains nothing about it. It is also crucial to be able to study the articles of association, because it is impossible to debate new clause 2 fully until we have seen the articles to discover how the Government intend to ensure—if they want to ensure—that these dockyards do not finally fall under foreign control.

There is a pile of documents called "Invitations to Tender". They will go out to the various companies which will then be allowed to tender for the contract to run the royal dockyards. The documents contain provisions which will be set in those contracts and those provisions must bear upon the three new clauses we shall debate. They must bear upon profit and loss, upon costs to the taxpayer and upon the share structure of the different companies.

New clause 3 is concerned with redundancy payments and pensions. I should have thought that the contracts must refer to the provisions regarding redundancies and pensions. We were told in Committee that, apparently, the Ministry of Defence would pay the pensions of the employees who had been transferred from the public to the private sector. We were told that, apparently, the contracts would contain provisions whereby the private contractor would have to add to the sum he would charge the Ministry of Defence to provide a proper pension comparable to the pensions provided in the public sector.

We are not asking for the contracts—we are asking to be allowed to see the invitations to tender. Many of the details are contained in these documents. A large number of the documents to which reference was made in Committee were considered to be secret or in confidence commercially and Committee members were not allowed to see them. The House will not be allowed to see them until the Bill becomes law.

It is not just a matter of documents not being available until within the last few hours. We are concerned with enabling legislation, which depends for its understanding and debate on a vast number of documents which have not been available to the House. When we debated the matters in Committee, we accepted Ministers' assurances in good faith. They told us, "These documents will be available for debate on the Floor of the House." We did not think that they would be made available only half an hour before the House was due to debate them. That is the burden of our complaint.

The documents could have been made available long before today. We have had the Easter recess. The documents could have been made available two or three weeks ago. It is no good the Under-Secretary of State for Defence Procurement shaking his head. He should tell the House why it was not possible to make the documents available. The Minister of State said that he could not do so because he gave them to the companies on 3 April. Time and time again, in the interests of the companies, their directors and outside parties, that is what happened with documents of paramount importance to Committee members. That is why we accepted the assurances that the documents would be provided. All the documents have still not been provided, but I think that most of those we were promised are here by now. They were available only half an hour ago and we have not, therefore, had an opportunity to study them before debating this important legislation.

This is not just another privatisation Bill. It transfers the operations of the royal dockyards from the public domain into the private sector. The Bill affects the livelihoods, pensions, redundancy payments and working practices of thousands of employees in Rosyth and Plymouth, Devonport. Because of the importance of these documents to this enabling legislation, which comprises four clauses —a skeletal piece of legislation—the Leader of the House should come to the Dispatch Box and tell us that the Bill will be withdrawn today, and will be brought back in a few days time. The Bill comprises only four clauses. It could certainly be dealt with next week without too much difficulty. If we had the documents, we could deal more rapidly with the Bill. If we do not have them, it will be much more difficult for us to deal with the clauses.

The Leader of the House should explain why we did not get the documents until half an hour before the debate was due to start. He should tell us that there is no urgency and that it will be possible to bring the Bill back next week. When we have had a chance to study the documents and to table amendments, the matter can be properly debated.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Ministers have heard that request and submission. This is a matter not for me but for the Ministers concerned.

Mr. Douglas: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I shall not take any more points of order on the lack of documents. We must continue with the business.

Mr. Douglas: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it a different point of order?

Mr. Douglas: I ask you to reflect on your own words, Mr. Deputy Speaker. You said that you were not willing to take further points of order on the lack of documents. My point of order concerns not the lack but the superfluity of documents. With respect——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Member knows very well that we are talking about the lack of documents, whether they are the right documents, and so on. I am not prepared to take any more points of order on that matter. We must get on to the debate.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Is it a different point of order?

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Yes, I want to raise a point of order about the position in which you find yourself when the Government take a particular approach to our procedures. In the past hour and a half, you have had to sit through a series of points of order. You have suggested repeatedly that those matters can be dealt with only by Ministers, especially the Leader of the House. It is clear that you believe that in your role as the protector of Members' rights you must, to some extent, rely upon Ministers fulfilling their responsibilities in the exercise of our procedures. Not once in the past one and a half hours——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Member is pursuing the issue which has been before the House for an hour and a half. I am not prepared to take any further points of order on that subject.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: It is a completely different matter.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The business will proceed better if hon. Members take note of the Chair.

Mr. McWilliam: I beg to move, That further consideration of the Bill, as amended, be now adjourned.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am prepared to accept the motion. Because the arguments have been raised over a considerable period, I shall use my powers to put the Question forthwith.

Mr. Donald Thompson.

Question accordingly negatived.

Mr. Denzil Davies: Despite the lateness of the documents coming to the Library, I shall endeavour again to argue for the new clause which I moved some time ago. In effect, the new clause proposes that a report be placed before the House of Commons itemising all the costs and savings, if any, which we doubt, which will arise as a result of what has been an ill-conceived and speculative exercise in attempting to turn the royal dockyards into a private venture.

Ministers have been reluctant to talk much about costs. Information was dragged out of them towards the end of the Committee stage of the Bill. The Under-Secretary became a bit tetchy and did not want to talk about that, although he said that there might be a report from the Property Services Agency on these matters which could be debated. But we have not yet had that report, although there have been surmises in the press on its contents.

First, what savings or costs will fall on the budget of the Ministry of Defence as a result of this operation and, secondly, what costs or savings will fall upon the Exchequer in general? First, let me deal with the Ministry of Defence's budget. On the Government's figures we have calculated that over a 10-year period from the start of privatisation—I accept that 10 years is a highly speculative period, during which time anything could happen, but that is the period that the Government have used for amortising costs—there will be a loss to the Ministry of Defence's budget of about £20 million a year. If we are wrong, no doubt the Minister will tell us when he replies. That comes to £200 million. That is a conservative estimate and I shall return to the way in which it has been arrived at. I need not remind the Minister that £200 million would almost buy two type 23 frigates or eight, nine or perhaps even 10 Tornadoes. That is the nature of the loss that will fall upon the Ministry of Defence over that period.

We know that right at the beginning large payments will have to be made. We have been told that at the beginning there will be a cost of £70 million. Part of that cost will be the cost of redundancy and of setting up the scheme —the accountancy and financial measures that have to be taken. I understand that part of that cost is to some extent the refurbishment of fixed assets. The initial cost of setting up this privatisation is an extraordinary figure. The turnover of the dockyards ranges between £400 million and £500 million. The £70 million that will have to be found almost immediately is almost 20 per cent. of the dockyards' turnover. That is an extraordinary position for the Government to be in. I have not checked, but I should be surprised if any of the other privatisation measures involving far more money attracted an initial cost of £70 million. That money has to be found. I do not think that it will all come from the Ministry of Defence's budget. I understand that some will come from the Civil Service pension and redundancy fund. But £70 million will have to be found almost immediately.

On top of that, £200 million will have to be found for the transfer of the pension scheme to the private employer. I accept that that money relates to liabilities that would in any case have accrued and would have to be paid for in future. In that £200 million figure we have not included the cost of any future redundancies. It is a conservative figure. We shall debate a redundancy fund when we come to new clause 3.

It was not clear in Committee what Ministers intended, but they said that the private employer, the management company, was hoping that the redundancy payment would be more or less similar to what would be paid by the Civil Service. If that is the case, where will the money come from? Will money for redundancies come from the Ministry of Defence in the same way as the money for pensions? In other words, will the contractor charge a bit more? The contractor does not have the money; he has only the contract with the Ministry of Defence and his only income is from progress payments from the Ministry of Defence. If the contractor wants to declare another 2,500 employees redundant in the two or three weeks or month after privatisation, where will he find the money for the redundancy payments to replicate—that was the word used in Committee—the kind of payments that would be paid by the Civil Service?

We have not included redundancy payments in the cost of £200 million over 10 years. Nor have we considered the question of emergency work. We did not debate that question very fully in Committee, but we debated it on Second Reading. No calculation seems to have been made of the cost to the Ministry of Defence of emergency work carried out by the private contractor. There was an example last week. HMS Illustrious had sailed little further than the Isle of Wight before it needed emergency work. I understand that that work will be done at the fleet maintenance base at Portsmouth. The costings for work at the maintenance base will be no different from what they are now, and they will not change in future. However, if the work on Illustrious could not have been done at Portsmouth, presumably the ship would have had to go back to Plymouth. The work must be done in a rush because Illustrious has to proceed to wherever it is going.

If the work was to be done at Plymouth, there would presumably be negotiations between the Ministry of Defence—the new outfit that is to be set up in Bath or somewhere — and private industry. What kind of negotiations would there be? Would the Ministry of Defence be in any position to tell the private contractor that it was charging too much, and in consequence to keep Illustrious anchored for a year off the Isle of Wight instead of sending it to join all the other fine ships of the American fleet in the south Pacific? Of course not. The Ministry of Defence would have to pay for the repairs, and pay through the nose. In our very conservative figure of the loss of £200 million to the Ministry of Defence budget over 10 years, we do not take into account the cost of doing such work.

Thirdly, we have not taken into account the recommendations of the 19 working parties. Where are those recommendations? Perhaps we will see them before these matters are debated in the House of Lords. Working parties are bound to make recommendations, and I am sure that the recommendations will cost money. Those costs, too, will have to be found from the budget of the Ministry of Defence. I doubt whether the Minister of State can give us an undertaking that the Treasury will foot the bill. There will be the cost, for instance, of carrying out the recommendations of the working party on nuclear safety. Costs may well result from the splitting of responsibility between the Ministry of Defence and the private contractor. That and other recommendations of the 19 working parties may result in a cost of £X million and that money will have to be found from the budget of the Ministry of Defence.

Our figure of £200 million is a conservative estimate which takes no account of emergency work, redundancy payments—which may at the end of the day fall upon the Ministry of Defence—or of the extra cost arising from the recommendations of the working parties.

The Government have made some assertions about the effect on the Exchequer as a whole. The Minister of State gave us some figures on Second Reading, although he himself admitted that they were more like guesses. We know that nothing will be saved for the budget of the Ministry of Defence and that, in fact, there will be costs to that budget. I hope that the Minister will confirm that. However, there is apparently a magic wand to be waved. Apparently, at the end of the day, when the profits and losses have been calculated and the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State has worked on the balance sheet as he used to in that back street accountancy practice in Manchester, there will be a profit figure of some kind. It will be a profit to the Exchequer for the greater good. The Defence Ministers will have subjugated their departmental duties to the greater good of the fisc. They were not operating in the Committee as departmental Ministers. They were operating for the Exchequer. No doubt the Treasury Ministers are very grateful to them.

How much will be saved for the Exchequer? The difficulty is that the figure keeps changing. The original figure was £26 million. That was the speculative figure suggested last June. That figure rapidly fell to £23 million in November. As we have not had the report of the Public Accounts Committee, we have to rely on what we can glean from statements. The figure for the amount by which the taxpayer will benefit fell again in February by the wondrously precise figure of £2 million, leaving a figure of £21 million. What is the figure now? We should be told. We have moved on since February and no doubt there are other costings to be taken into account. Has there been any further change in the figure?

Apparently, there is to be a saving of £21 million over the period of 10 years over which initial costs are to be amortised, although the initial costs are only part of the total exercise. Apparently, over that period about £21 million is to be saved every year. Let us consider how that figure was arrived at. No doubt the Minister of State will correct me—he has all the papers—but I understand that the figure was worked out as follows. First, there are the actual savings. There will be a reduction in personnel, or the sacking of people.

There will be a further saving because the Treasury will not pay the pensions any more. Curiously, although the Exchequer will not pay the pensions, the Ministry of Defence will do so. Pension payments will amount to £8 million or £9 million a year. Under the present arrangement they are paid out of the Civil Service pension fund. After privatisation they can no longer be paid out of that fund. They cannot be paid out of the pension fund of the consortium company or main company that is to run the dockyards because the employees are employed not by that company but by the management company, and the management company has only one contract — the contract with the Ministry of Defence. The effect will be the same as in the case of the redundancy payments. How will the company pay the pensions except by adding to the price which it charges to the Ministry of Defence?

That is what is envisaged. That is why the Under-Secretary has been able to give an assurance that the pensions will not be that different from the pensions paid out of the Civil Service pension scheme. The Exchequer will save about £9 million a year because it will not have to meet the pension payments. However, the Ministry of Defence will have to meet those payments so that the £9 million, or perhaps a little less, will come out of the defence budget. It will not come out of the Exchequer. Therefore, that will be a saving in terms of the grand balance sheet the Government are constructing.

Costs have to be deducted out of savings. As I have said previously, the figure for savings was £26 million, it then came down to £23 million and it is now £21 million. We have seen what the savings will be. Let us consider the costs of the operation to see how we arrive at the figure of £21 million. As I understand it, one figure of costs is for something called a customer organisation. Apparently, new jobs are being created; the Government are actually creating new jobs. The original costs for that customer organisation were envisaged to be £2 million. The Minister of State will correct me if I am wrong. The costs went up and up and are now estimated at £11 million a year.

What is the customer organisation? It will create new jobs, new bureaucrats and more paper to shuffle around. What will the people who will cost the Ministry of Defence £11 million be doing? They are there to negotiate and work out the arrangement between the supplier and the buyer, the private company and the Ministry of Defence, between the monopoly seller and buyer. We need some organisation within the Ministry of Defence to do that work. We do not need it at the moment. There is no need to spend £11 million for people to do that work because it is done within the same organisation. However, once a commercial organisation has been set up it will be necessary to negotiate with Trafalgar House about the costs of repairing warships, refitting or emergency work on HMS Illustrious or any other ship that has to come into Portsmouth or Rosyth.

Can the Minister of State tell us why, within a year, there has been a 500 per cent. increase in the cost of the so-called customer organisation? I do not know exactly where the organisation will be, but I think that the Under-Secretary will agree that it will probably be in Bath.

It is obscene that the Government have put 2,500 dockyard workers out of work in Rosyth and Devonport in the interests of so-called efficiency. Many of them, if not all of them, work on ships, do things with their hands and have technical skills. They will be put out of work and £11 million a year will be spent on some kind of customer organisation in somewhere like Bath where they will just shuffle paper around because of the operation the Government are setting up. It is obscene that the Government are taking money away from people who work at the dockyards and putting it into the hands of a bureaucratic body, which would not be necessary if the Government did not go ahead with their hare-brained scheme. Therefore, £11 million will be in respect of a new bureaucracy set up as a result of the Government's plans.

The Ministry of Defence has to make some assessment of the profit that the contractors will make because the profit to the contractor must be a cost to the Ministry of Defence. No doubt those figures are commercially in confidence and, even if I knew them, I would not wish to breach that confidence on the Floor of the House because the Government have to negotiate with the companies. However, my understanding is that the original profit figure was much higher than it is now. The Ministry of Defence or the Government accountancy service, or whoever, have tried, I would not say to fiddle the figures, but to make them look a little better. They have done that by reducing by 35 per cent. the Government's assessment of the profits of contractors for Rosyth and Devonport. That is not a small reduction. We started with one figure in June 1985 and over a period the Government have become more optimistic in terms of the Ministry of Defence because they have scaled down the profit figure by 35 per cent. I do not know what that figure is, but my impression is that it is a fairly low profit figure on a turnover of £400 million or £500 million.

The Minister of State would obviously not wish to tell us what the figures are, but perhaps he could tell us how on earth the Government can scale down the profit figure by 35 per cent. It is very convenient to do so because it reduces the costs. By reducing the costs, it increases the savings and, as I have said, the savings are now £21 million a year. If the figure of profit had not been scaled down, there would have been a substantial cut in those savings. That is why the figure for savings is not worth the paper it is written on. It is a purely speculative statement. The Minister of State knows that, as does the Under-Secretary.

I am sorry to mention Manchester again, but the Manchester accountants had a high reputation within the Labour party at one time. I am sure that the Under-Secretary also had a high reputation. If somebody had brought in the balance sheet which is being presented, he would have thrown it in the waste paper basket in his office in Manchester. The figures of £21 million, £23 million or £26 million are not worth the calculation. The Government have thought of a figure, put it in a table and found some justification for it. Perhaps the Minister could tell us how he justifies the figure of £21 million.

Frankly, we do not believe that there will be any savings to the Exchequer, or anybody else, as a result of this exercise. There will be costs. Most of them, not all, will fall directly on the Ministry of Defence. Those costs will come out of the defence budget. Money will come out of equipment and items needed for defence and will be spent on bureaucracy and private contractors. Nothing that has been shown to us has dispelled that belief.

We believe that at the end of the day the Navy will get an inferior service and at a higher cost. It is no good the Minister of State shaking his head. He has not produced one figure to dispel that belief. There was a long statement on Second Reading about improved efficiency and improved working methods. Can the Minister of State put one figure on what will be saved from improved efficiency? All he can put a figure on is how much will be saved by sacking 2,500 people. He cannot put a figure on improved efficiency or so-called better working practices. The figures that are being produced have nothing to do with that. They are concerned solely with actual savings and actual costs. No money will be saved. There is no case for privatisation on the ground of saving money. Indeed, money will be lost to the Ministry of Defence. Perhaps the Minister of State will tell us that our figures are wrong and that there will be savings. From what we have seen and heard, there will be no savings. This is purely an ideological kick by the Government. It has nothing to do with saving money. It will cost the country and the armed forces money.

Dr. Owen: This is a probing new clause, but it goes to the root of this miserable Bill. There is no question, and the Government do not deny this now, but that in the first three and a half years of implementation there will be extra costs to the Royal Navy. The only question is whether, during the next six and a half years, there will be sufficient savings to compensate fully for the extra costs incurred in the first three and a half years. Nothing that has been presented to the House, to the Select Committee on Defence or to the Public Accounts Committee gives any confidence that this will do anything other than cost the Navy dear. It will certainly cost the Navy in money terms, but it will be an even greater cost in terms of the inability to turn round the capital ships of the Navy at the speed which the Navy requires.

We constantly forget that the task of the dockyards is to act effectively as a garage for the Royal Navy, to be available for instant use in cases of emergency and to have the capacity to ensure the full value of these capital ships.

I shall not refer to the lamentable delay in producing the information, but one advantage of the period that we managed to extract from the Government for analysis of the Bill is that we now have some figures for the costs and assets that we are discussing. The replacement value of the assets of Devonport dockyard has been estimated, taking 1985 as the base year, at £772,740,970. That is a vast sum of money. The existing use value of Devonport dockyard has been estimated at £227,727,830. The annual value is £23,911,090. We are dealing with a massive industrial enterprise. The Government have not been prepared to privatise those assets because they know that no one could possibly find the money to buy them. So there is an agency arrangement.

We had great difficulty in pinning down the extra costs. I gather that there is an estimated £30 million in consultancy fees and so far unquantified costs in Ministry of Defence staff time. That money has been spent before the exercise has started. There is the £46 million to ensure the continuation of the supply service to the Ministry of Defence, and between £150 million and £200 million to set up pension funds for transferred service. In addition, VAT must be paid on dockyard contracts.

A licence fee will be payable quarterly in advance when assets are described in the schedules. It is proposed that the licence fee will be equal to the annual value to which I have already referred. It will need to be adjusted periodically during the term of the contract to take account of changes in the composition of the assets as a result of new investment or the removal of assets to take account of inflation, depreciation and other factors. There is a continuing cost in dealing with the estimation of the assets.

Under these arrangements, we are told that the contractor will be fully responsible for the maintenance and repair of the assets at his expense. In some circumstances, the Ministry will bear the cost of replacing the assets and the contractor will normally be invited to tender for the supply and/or the installation of replacement assets. In other circumstances, the cost of replacement will be borne by the contractor. All of these carry heavy estimating costs, continuing consultancy arrangements and, indeed, bureaucracy.

On bureaucracy, it appears that the Ministry's organisation to monitor and oversee the contracts will employ as many as 900 people. I should be grateful if the Minister of State would let us know the exact size of the monitoring organisation, which will be set up in Bath or perhaps spread through the dockyards. How much will it cost? It may cost tens of millions of pounds.

I am told by the Shipbuilding Trades Joint Council that an internal Ministry of Defence report has identified future requirements for 11 officers in nuclear and radiological safety, five officers in nuclear qualified secondment, an unquantified extra requirement for naval base commanders for personnel work at Devonport and Rosyth, 18 naval personnel for local emergency monitoring organisations and 25 officers on ships acceptance trials. The biggest extra investment is expected in the proposed enhancement of the Navy's fleet maintenance bases as a direct consequence of agency management. We do not have real estimates of those, although the first estimate for the Ministry of Defence is £3·5 million in capital expenditure and 80 extra naval personnel. This is at a time when there is some difficulty in manning the Navy fully.

The dockyards will be supplied by the Ministry of Defence with the management financial ledger, an accounting package for the use of the contractors; the cost of that is estimated at £95 million. The story will be unravelled month by month. There will be probing and investigation and we shall calculate the costs of this enterprise. My view is that the Minister of State's heart is not in it. Certainly we cannot blame him as he was not in at the start of the exercise. This hare-brained scheme was initiated by the right hon. Member for Henley (Mr.

Heseltine). There is no reason why the Minister of State or the Secretary of State should continue with this beyond the satisfaction of getting the legislation passed.

There will be increased costs in the commercial world. We are told that before entering into contracts for non-defence work that required deployment of significant resources or prolonged use of facilities, especially docks, or which are likely to result in consequential time or cost penalties to Ministry of Defence work, prior consultation with the DGSR — this new bureaucracy — will be required. So far from setting them free, they will have to look back over their shoulders to get permission from Bath.

We are told that on refits and repairs it should be clearly understood that this core programme is based on the current fleet requirements and that changes will be unavoidable as tasks and operational needs alter. The DGSR will review the core programme with the contractor on a quarterly basis and will also discuss changes as they arise at the earliest possible date. There is a constant Ministry of Defence involvement with this agency management at every stage, and at every stage there is duplication and cost.

We are also told in relation to operational defects and other unprogrammed works on Royal Navy vessels and auxiliaries that the contractor may, however, be required from time to time to carry out such work on a non-competitive basis. The contractor will be required to comply with requests to undertake this work, which may be crucial to fleet availability. There will be contractual obligations over and above the core work imposed on the contractor, and the Ministry of Defence will demand that this work be done. What control will there be on the price? No one else is involved and there will be a monopoly.

HMS Illustrious is a perfect example. We are told that the work on that ship could be handled by the fleet maintenance base in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Portsmouth, South (Mr. Hancock). But what happens if it cannot be done by that base? It comes into work unprogrammed to the fleet contractor. Big vessels, such as HMS Illustrious, can go only to Devonport. But the dockyard work programme is full, so the private agency management turns round to the dockyard and demands almost what it wants. There is no one else to go to.

We are also told about the company structure. We are told that this two-tier company structure is preferred by the Ministry for several reasons. The next bit is worth quoting. It says that one reason is that "it will enable the Ministry more easily to detach the dockyard workforce from the contractor when the term contract ends for whatever reason."

We are talking about people who have given a lifetime of service to the dockyards.

6.30 pm

We then try to find out what all this means. The document says:

"In the event that the term contract is terminated for whatever reason the original contractor will be required on termination to transfer all his shares in the dockyard company either to the new contractor or to the Ministry. This will in effect transfer the employment of the dockyard workforce to the new contractor or the Ministry."

I assume that that means that when the contract is terminated the whole dockyard labour force is automatically transferred. But what would happen if the core programme for the new contract was substantially less than was given for the first 10-year contract? Will the whole work force be taken on? As the Ministry knows, there is a real difficulty. Someone must be responsible for those men before the redundancy payments are made. Effectively, the Government are saying that the new contractor will take on the work force even though, as a result of the new core programme for a further seven-year contract, the first task may be to make the men redundant.

We then find that there are no safeguards covering the second contract period. I believe that the only contractual arrangement is that guarantees have been given as to how to deal with this situation in the case of the initial redundancy. But there is no safeguard for the redundancies that we fear will follow the second seven-year contractual period. Thus, there would be no safeguards for a second agency management, which would never even be expected to employ the men. I believe that I am right in saying that.

Mr. Gordon Brown: Does the right hon. Gentleman accept that the Ministry's provision for redundancy payments is just on the first letting of the contract and that there is no provision for redundancy payments made during the first seven years?

Dr. Owen: Yes, but it is even more worrying that for the second term, when the contract starts again—since it requires a new core programme to be negotiated—those responsible for redundancies would not even be the people who employed those men for the first seven years. Those responsible would come in suddenly and would have no relationship with the work force. In those circumstances, it does not require much imagination to realise what poor redundancy terms would be offered. The more one looks at the programme, the more one sees that a lot of feeling will be aroused, that the parallel organisation built up in Bath will expand and that the cost will also increase.

The 10-year programme will obviously envelop one period when the term contract is likely to be changed and so the costs will be far higher than has been outlined by the Minister. We shall discuss later how something can be rescued from this mess, but I shall not anticipate that now. In the meantime, will the Minister give us all the information at the very least that has already been given to the PAC, and will he try to answer some of the questions put to him about the growth in costs? Indeed, senior naval officers are now anxious, and are saying that if it had been made clear to them that this extraordinary miasma of interlocking committees overseeing parallel organisations had been envisaged, they would not have dreamt of embarking upon such a course.

The Minister owes it to himself completely to rethink the situation. The Bill will no doubt be forced through tonight with the votes of Conservative Members, but before the final moment when no changes can be made, perhaps he will reconsider this whole issue. The point is that the cost to the Royal Navy, the taxpayer and the country is unquantified but is already quite imaginable, and is far greater than the Government have acknowledged.

Mr. Douglas: I shall be brief. We know that certain evidence was given to the Defence Committee and to the PAC last year. To coin a phrase, we shall deal not with a snippet from Tippet but with the information given by Sir Clive Whitmore to the PAC. In response to question No. 257, Sir Clive said:

[Mr. Douglas]

> "We have got to say that we have to make a lot of assumptions in doing these costings about a situation we have not faced before. We have had to make assumptions about the rate of profit that the contractor would want to see. We have had to make assumptions about redundancies which in the end might not actually be fulfilled if the contractor came in and decided after he had some experience of running the dockyard that he wanted to adopt an expansionist approach by seeking non-defence work to add to the defence work. The redundancies might turn out to be fewer than we assume. We have tried to approach the costings on a worst case or near worst case basis, but we do not think that in the event the savings could turn out to be larger than those that Vice-Admiral Tippet had been mentioning."

We know that the PAC has examined those so-called savings. However, in the interim, a Standing Committee has consistently probed the Government's estimates. The Government have not been very forthcoming about the nature of those savings. We have seen a change in attitude from the original proposals about a managing company and an employing company to the Government wishing to have a managing company and a dockyard company as the repository of the labour force.

There is no sign of any savings from the costing exercise. Indeed, there are no savings, but only costs and heartache. I could take up the time of the House by reading all of the Fuller Peiser report, but I shall not do so. Incidentally, I do not cast any aspersions on the chartered surveyors, as I recognise the difficulties. However, the Government propose to hand over plant and buildings. The report says:

> "Most buildings have been visited and some have been inspected in detail with reliance being placed upon the drawings of the PSA plan library for dimensions. This has enabled us to estimate valuations which we consider to be reliable on the whole but it will be necessary to check the details of the scheduling and allocation of values during the course of stage 2.
> Plant & Machinery
> Whilst buildings have been briefly visited no plant has been inspected in any detail, reliance being placed on existing records obtained from the Finance Department and Yard Services Department and a list provided by the Cost Centre."

There is no way any responsible Government Minister can say to the House, "This scheme to change the ownership of the dockyards to a contractual relationship will produce savings." We assert that it will be costly. Why? First, because of disruptions. The Government have undermined the morale of the labour force at Rosyth and at Devonport. When the morale of a highly skilled labour force is undermined, productivity may tail off. That will be a cost. Currently management has to spend time holding the hands of contractors who are going through the yards, indicating what functions they might have to perform. That is a cost—not one which we will see immediately in the accounts but a cost in terms of satisfying the Navy.

Additional costs were mentioned by the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen) such as the cost of redundancy, the cost of pensions and the cost of indicating to contractors what security functions they might have to perform. I have scanned the documents quickly and some of the details are frightening. At the beginning the Ministry of Defence police will have certain functions but in later years the so-called contractors may bring in security personnel. This is a tangential remark; in Committee I recall that the Under-Secretary could not assure us that such security personnel would not be employed where there were nuclear facilities. I hope that he can assure the House and the country that his further reflections will lead him to insist that no private security personnel will be employed on nuclear functions in Devonport or Rosyth.

This is an exercise in dogma. It is significant, as I mentioned earlier, that neither of two right hon. Members whose names appear on the back of the Bill is present in the House. Where is the right hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine), who was the arch-promoter of the Bill? Neither of the two hon. Gentlemen who are on the Front Bench has his heart in the Bill. It is the product of the right hon. Member for Henley and of the person whom he brought into the Ministry of Defence, Mr. Peter Levene. There is no evidence that any savings will accrue to the Exchequer or to the Ministry of Defence from the promotion of the scheme.

Although I may be out of order on the new clause, I suggest that the Government should reconsider their objectives. If they have the interest of the Navy at heart, they will cease this costly exercise and stop asking people to examine the dockyard facilities. That will not increase the value of anything. They should stop the nonsense of bringing in contractors and holding them by the hand. They should retain a wholly owned public corporation. All the other things that they want to do can be done just as easily by retaining all the assets, including the labour force, within the public sector. To continue producing huge documents and inviting Touche Ross and other consultants to go through the dockyards is a costly waste of time and will be of no benefit to anyone in the Navy or in the dockyard. It is costly to the country as a whole.

Mr. Gordon Brown: The purpose of the new clause is to ensure that information not available to us before the implementation of the scheme will be available to the House after its implementation. I emphasise what my hon. Friend the Member for Dunfermline, West (Mr. Douglas) has just said. We are worried about the absence not only of the right hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine), who was not just the author of the scheme, but who made such extravagant claims for it, but of the Secretary of State for Defence, who is a newcomer to the privatisation of dockyards. We are concerned, too, about the absence of almost all Conservative Members with constituencies in the south-west, who have said to local trade unionists at Devonport that, while they could not be present in Committee, they were examining the scheme with interest.

I should have thought that the Government would be anxious to accept the new clause, because it will allow them to prove to the House that there will be savings and to test the philosophy of value for money and open competition. The new clause is very much in line with the recommendation of the all-party Public Accounts Committee, which asked that there should be proper monitoring of the scheme. The new clause would get over the problem which the Public Accounts Committee foresaw early on, when it said that the evidence presented to it by the Ministry of Defence about savings was about the worst evidence that it had ever received.

I can understand the embarrassment of Ministers if they were to accept the amendment, because they would have to show to the House and to another place, year in, year out, that an exercise whose sole purpose was to save money would end up costing money, not just in one year or two years, but for the rest of the decade, and almost certainly for the rest of the century. The evidence would show that the Ministry of Defence, the Admiralty Board, and the managing directors of Devonport and Rosyth dockyards had been duped by Mr. Peter Levene and by the right hon. Member for Henley into believing that it was possible, by this shabby scheme, to make savings. We tabled the new clause because effectively the Bill offers a blank cheque to two private contractors who will be in a monopoly position to dictate the terms of refits for vessels and submarines for the Royal Navy.

What we know already is alarming enough. The Ministry of Defence will have to ask the Treasury to set up a private pension fund, which will cost £150 million, or perhaps £200 million. The initial bill for redundancy payments will be about £40 million, and private consultants are to be paid £30 million, making a total of £70 million for transitional costs. Other costs associated with starting up the scheme will be involved in the creation of a new stores and supply organisation if the contractor decides that he wants to contract out, and we are reliably told that that could cost as much as £46 million. It has been conceded by the Minister's working party that the expansion of the fleet maintenance base will cost several million pounds.

The Minister of State has a duty to tell the House today what he will cancel to pay all the start-up costs, which I estimate to be about £300 million even in the first year of the scheme. Will he cancel the type 23s? Will he not proceed with the auxiliary oil replenishment vessels, for which there is such fierce competition between two shipyards? Are savings to come only from the Navy, or from the Navy, the Army and the Air Force? He should tell us how his Department proposes to pay an initial bill which could run beyond £300 million in the first year after the implementation of the scheme.

Those are only the known costs associated with the start-up of the privatisation project. The Minister ought to tell us his estimate for the profits of a private operator. My assumption is that on a turnover of £415 million for the dockyards they would not be less than 10 per cent., making an additional cost of £40 million, which must be recouped.

The Minister ought to tell us what exactly the cost of the new monitoring organisation which he is proposing to set up will be. Our estimate is that it will take about £11 million a year to pay for the additional hundreds of staff who will be involved only in supervisory operations. The Minister ought to tell us what the additional costs associated with value added tax will be, and the costs of setting up an additional and new form of accountancy organisation to which his Ministry is committed. We ought to be told what the known costs that the Ministry of Defence has to recoup by savings in other areas will be for each year that the scheme is in operation. Again, these are only the known costs associated with the year-to-year operation of the dockyards under private control.

There are also the unknown costs and the uncalculable costs because, no matter what it says in the tender documents, the Ministry of Defence, in its advice to contractors, is effectively enabling two companies to dictate the price at which they will do work.

The problem of emergency work during the period of refits has not been properly addressed by the Ministry of Defence in its proposals for this scheme. The problem of unprogrammed work, when the contractor will have to change his basic timetable to accommodate the Ministry of Defence, has not been dealt with either. The problem of emergency work is dealt with in only one paragraph of one of the working party reports, where the Ministry readily concedes that it will have to reimburse the contractor for taking on emergency work demanded by the fleet which would interfere with the private contractor's programme. This is unique. The Ministry of Defence will pay extra money to use a facility that it owns.

I do not understand why the Ministry of Defence has not been prepared to accept the advice of the Treasury, which in its privatisation guidelines make it clear that "When work is transferred to the private sector it is important to consider the problems that might arise if a department becomes tied to a monopoly supplier"

We know that the record of the private sector in naval refits is inferior to that of the public sector. The Minister cannot produce any evidence, either from the experience of the 1960s and 1970s or from recent refits such as HMS Redpole, that the private sector is better for quality, efficiency, delivery time or cost. All previous reports on dockyard work, whether the Speed report, the Hudson report or the Mallabar report, have concluded that the public sector is more dependable, more efficient and cheaper.

The Ministry of Defence admits that transitional costs will be very high, that the year-to-year costs to the defence budget will be greater than if the dockyards were run under the present public sector arrangements, and that there is a price to be paid for demanding emergency unprogrammed work under private control. Having heard all the evidence that the public sector is better for time, efficiency, delivery and cost, the Ministry is prepared to hand the dockyards over to private contractors.

The purpose of the Levene document, which initiated this sorry tale of events about the dockyards, was to save money. When the Gracious Speech announced that the dockyards were to be moved to commercial management, the stated objective was to secure value for money. When the right hon. Member for Henley defended his programme before the House, he said that he would secure that value for money. The evidence is now overwhelming and clear that there is not a hope of the Ministry of Defence saving money. Indeed, it will have to spend money. Far from diminishing the costs of naval support, the scheme will increase them.

The Minister should accept the new clause, tell us that there will be further consultation on the scheme, and withdraw the Bill.

Mr. Michael Hancock (Portsmouth, South): The hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) has got to the crux of the matter. The absence of Conservative Members is a clear sign of widespread support for new clause 1. No doubt the Minister is hoping that their absence will mean that he has an easier task convincing his one hon. Friend who is present that the Bill should be accepted.

New clause 1 asks the questions that the Minister promised to answer time and again in Committee to justify the Bill and what gains there will be for the national purse, the Royal Navy and for the people who work in the dockyards. There has been no attempt to answer those questions. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen) said, £750 million is invested in the Devonport dockyard alone. These are huge sums of money, so we should know what benefits will accrue from the transfer of responsibilities.

The Ministry's notes on clauses beg more questions. Many of us have been denied access to documents that might have provided the answers. The notes state the Ministry's objectives. The first is full value for money from the defence budget. How will such value be achieved? Where will savings be made? The second objective is maximum competition. The third is freedom for local management from public sector constraints, enabling them to operate effectively in a competitive environment. The fourth is improved efficiency. If efficiency is improved, there must be savings. Why are Ministers reluctant to elaborate on what efficiency and savings will mean? The fifth objective is a clear separation between the dockyard as the supplier and the Royal Navy as the customer.

HMS Illustrious returned to Portsmouth recently because of gearbox trouble. Both of the other Invincible class carriers were tied alongside the fleet maintenance depot in Portsmouth. What would have happened, as might happen in two years' time, if the fleet maintenance operation had been dealing with one of the other carriers? There would have been protracted negotiations between the Navy, the organisation in Bath and the contractor about shifting the ship from Portsmouth to Devonport and about the cost of the job. It is unfortunate and dangerous that we are putting the future role of the Navy at risk because we are allowing a contractor to name his price. The Government should ensure that there is no doubt about the financial justification for this Bill. The Minister surely cannot fail to answer the question that this new clause asks. Failure to do so must convince everybody, including the Minister's colleagues, that the Bill has no future, and must go into the wastepaper bin.

Mr. Bruce George (Walsall, South): When I look at the Government Benches, I am reminded of an Adjournment debate. It is a profoundly disillusioning experience for many hon. Members. I suppose that there are people who still naively assume that the Conservative party is the party of defence. That cannot be justified by the attendance of Conservative Members in the Chamber or by the Government's decisions. We know that Conservative Members are in the building because they all poured into the Chamber an hour and a half ago. However, it is clear that they have no stomach for what is being decided in their name. Apart from it being profoundly disillusioning, it is also unusual to find, perhaps for the first time, that those on the Opposition Benches this evening greatly outnumber those on the Government Benches; and those who are sitting in the Civil Service box outnumber both Opposition and Government supporters. It has been worth coming into the Chamber for just that experience.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies) said that the Government team is acting at the behest of the Treasury. That is wrong. It is acting at the behest of Tory Central Office and of those who drafted the last Conservative manifesto which eulogised privatisation. That was to be the solution and the cure for many of the ills in our economy. When that principle was applied to the Ministry of Defence, it was obliged to implement lunacies that had been decided upon years ago in the smoke filled rooms of Tory Central Office, or wherever the manifesto was drafted.

The result of the Government's policies provides an inane solution. It will exacerbate this country's already considerable defence problems. The Government are hopelessly over-committed. The resources available to them to meet their growing commitments are inadequate. As the Government are unable, for one reason or another — public opinion is one factor — to increase defence expenditure in order to meet their growing commitments, they have thrown the principles of the market place at these complex problems. However, when one looks rationally at how efficiency is to be gained and at how our fighting forces are adequately to be equipped and led, one winces at what one sees. By their dogmatic solutions the Government are trying to save money. However, the contracting out that has taken place has been something of an illusion. Those who have suffered most have been cleaners or those who are engaged in security. The Government have not gained, therefore, from contracting out.

The Government have also tried to reorganise the Ministry of Defence because they believe that that is a means by which efficiency can be achieved. However, the amount that has been saved by greater efficiency in the Ministry of Defence is marginal. The Government have tried the privatisation solution. I served on the Standing Committee that dealt with the privatisation of the royal ordnance factories. I do not think that the public has gained very much from that process. Political dogma and the desire for efficiency have resulted in the Bill that we have been considering for the past few months.

If the Government believe that the public will gain from the privatisation of the dockyards, they are making a great mistake. It has already been pointed out that when the ledger is finally drawn the public will be the net losers —and very heavy losers. The gainers will be those who are lucky enough to pick up the contracts. Further losers will be our armed forces. The Ministry of Defence will have to bear the additional cost of consultancy fees. This is a growth industry. Hundreds of consultancies and so-called public relations experts will be involved. There will also be the cost of setting up pension funds for the staff who have to be transferred. I agree that that has to be done, but it will be costly.

In accordance with Mr. Speaker's wisdom, I am sure that the Ministers are disappointed that they will be unable to listen to and comment upon points relating to security. Instead of just the Ministry of Defence police, there are to be two security systems in the dockyards. There will be the Ministry of Defence police — although Ministers might have liked to get rid of them, they were unable to do so, for all sorts of reasons — and alongside them there will be the gradual extension of private security. That, too, will have to be paid for. When one looks at the additional staff who will have to be employed by the Ministry of Defence, the cost of redundancies and the value added tax that will have to be paid, one begins to construct a ledger and to realise that the public will be the losers.

The clause is important because it points out to the House and to the public, if it needs to be pointed out, that this privatisation lark will be yet another disaster. The clause therefore seeks to establish a modicum of parliamentary accountability and scrutiny.

Before the debate began, I was in the Library. I was not looking through the documents to which reference has been made. They were being bandied about in the Chamber, probably to greater effect. I was looking at the legislative role of Congress. Congress is very much involved in the legislative process. Hon. Members discuss each year one or two defence Bills. This Bill was introduced in such a way as to make constructive criticism and constructive comment exceedingly difficult.

If one believes in efficiency, the Government ought to consider that they have been provided with a great opportunity to justify how clever they have been by being obliged to place before the House the savings that they intend to make. The new clause ought to be regarded by the Government and their supporters as providing an opportunity to justify those savings. However, none of the Government Back Benchers who served on the Standing Committee is in the Chamber. It has brought a new dimension to the term "Trappist". At least they were physically present in Committee, but they are not physically present, or even possibly spiritually or intellectually present, for these proceedings. Government Back Benchers fulfilled their obligations to the Whips and then cleared off. It is a pity that they are not here at least to justify to their constituents why they wasted space being on that Committee. At least two members of our Committee had the excuse of being simultaneously engaged in the inquiry into Westland.

This clause is an attempt to establish some form of accountability. In view of the proceedings in Committee and the charade that we are going through at the moment, being denied the information essential to us as legislators in achieving our objective of scrutinising Government policy and legislation, it is clear that the Government are seeking to bypass Parliament, or to use merely the shell of Parliament, in order to go through the process with as little inconvenience as possible to themselves.

If the vast numbers of Conservatives who are at present in their offices rush out when the call comes and, with superb efficiency, vote down new clause 1, the Government will lose an opportunity, even within their own warped ideological perspective, to show the House and the world how effective they have been in making savings for the public Exchequer.

I believe that this clause deserves, but will not get, proper attention from the Government and Government Back Benchers. It seeks to achieve a small degree of parliamentary accountability, which I believe that this Government will seek to deny. I believe that the reason that it will not be approved is that the Government realise, if they look very carefully at what they have decided and what they have put into this legislation, that the savings will prove an illusion. The people who gain from this process will be, not the services or the British taxpayer, but the dogmatists and those who may be able to pick up the contract and profit financially.

My name is appended to the list of those who tabled new clause 1, and I very much hope that those people who are not listening to this debate will have some pangs of conscience and will support it. If the clause is approved, the many hours that we spent in Committee and the hours that we are spending here may not prove to be such a waste of time.

Mr. Norman Lamont: A large number of points have been raised in this debate and I shall do my best to reply to them and to give the House some of the information that it has been seeking. First, however, I wish to direct my remarks to what new clause 1 does, because I do not believe that it is sensible.

The new clause would have my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State set out all the costs and savings of £100 or more resulting from the decision that the dockyards services should be provided by a company under commercial management. The new clause does not say when such a report is to be made. Clearly, since it talks of savings resulting from arrangements made, it does not mean that such a report is to be made before the Government's policy is implemented. It does not say whether the report should be made after the scheme has been in operation for a month, a year, five years or the full term of the original contract, which is seven years. The House should also consider what, even were the clause worded properly, it would achieve in terms of legislation. It does not say what should happen if the savings are large, small or non-existent. For those reasons, I do not think that the clause would achieve anything.

I appreciate that one of the reasons for tabling the new clause was to raise questions about the costs and the savings, and I should like now to try to reply to some of the points that have been raised.

It is open knowledge that our latest costings, which were made in February of this year, showed an annual surplus to the Exchequer of £21 million over each of the first 10 years of commercial management, during which time the setting-up costs would be amortised, and thereafter savings were estimated at some £28 million a year. On our latest estimates, therefore, there should be savings of £210 million in the first 10 years, and greater savings thereafter.

Hon. Gentlemen have referred to the amortisation of costs over the 10-year period and have criticised what they see as the heavy setting-up costs involved. One point that is ignored by hon. Gentlemen when they make these criticisms is that whatever system is evolved to try to improve the performance of the dockyards — hon. Gentlemen have been urging upon us another solution, that of having a trading fund, some other middle way, as they see it—many of these initial setting-up costs will have to be incurred.

It seemed to be common ground in Committee that we need to tackle the problem of inefficiency in the dockyards. Report after report has said that performance is not all that it might be, and that such things as the setting up of accountancy systems, which involve software programmes and the purchase of hardware, are necessary for the modernisation of the dockyards and the setting up of a proper commercial framework. That would have to happen whichever solution we adopted for the dockyards.

Mr. O'Neill: Given that the Government undertook a wide-ranging survey of the various options beforehand, perhaps the Minister of State could tell us how much the start-up costs of a PLC would have been, so that we have some realistic basis of comparison. As far as we can see, none of the alternatives would have cost the £70 million or so which has been mentioned by various hon. Members.

Mr. Lamont: I shall go further into the question of the £70 million, and I hope that when I do that it will become apparent that many of the measures to improve efficiency would be necessary whichever vehicle was chosen, and many of them are the manifestations of increased efficiency.

Mr. Denzil Davies rose——

Mr. Lamont: I shall give way to the right hon. Gentleman, but then I want to take my argument further, because it meets exactly the point raised by the hon. Member for Clackmannan (Mr. O'Neill).

Mr. Davies: The Minister said that the annual surplus to the Exchequer over the 10-year period would be £21 million. Can he tell us what the annual deficit to the Ministry of Defence would be in each of those 10 years?

Mr. Lamont: I am coming on to the impact on defence as well.

Mr. Gordon Brown rose——

Mr. Lamont: No, I shall proceed just a bit further.

As the new clause refers to a report to Parliament, the House might like to know that it is our intention that the customer organisation—or, to give it its proper title, the Directorate General of Ship Refitting—will produce an annual report of the previous year's dealings with the dockyard company at each yard and with others involved in the refitting and repair of naval vessels. As, unlike now, there will have been a separation of the Navy as customers from dockyard to supplier, and there will be in existence commercially accepted accounting procedures, the annual report which the DGSR presents will have to be full and informative. Additionally, the books of the two dockyard companies will be open to my Department to the same extent as are any other defence contractors' books when we have negotiated a non-competitive contract with them.

The right hon. Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies) outlined the structure of the savings and costs. While in no way retreating from the figures that have been given earlier to the House and to the Public Accounts Committee, I should like to say that the figures are based on worst case assumptions and are not a prediction of what will happen. There are many variables; for example, the savings that can be achieved and the efficiency gains that may be exceeded. The figures are not a prediction, but we have had to answer questions and make certain assumptions.

The right hon. Gentleman asked what changes had been made since the previous estimates. They include alterations to the amount of profit that has been assumed. The profit that is now being assumed is calculated according to the Ministry of Defence profit formula, but there is not one profit formula. Different profit formulae are applicable to different industries; for example, according to their capital intensity. Another example is the setting-up costs and the implementation of commercial accounting systems, which include software and hardware. All those fall within the £70 million initial costs that we have been assuming.

The right hon. Member for Llanelli outlined the structure of costs and savings as he saw it, and basically got the equation right. However, I cannot fill in all the figures under those headings, because it would not be right to do so. We would certainly not wish potential contractors to know certain of them, but I shall reply to some. The right hon. Gentleman is right in saying that the initial costs include the changes in working practices, the preparatory work that is being done, and worst case assumptions about redundancies, which may not happen. Annual costs cover the customer organisation, contractors' profits and amortisation. We estimate the initial costs at £70 million. The figures that we have been analysing are nowhere near the figures mentioned by the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown), who talked about £350 million. I noticed that he was at least modest in that he did not go as far as some trade unions have done in mentioning a figure in excess of £400 million.

Mr. Gordon Brown: If the Minister accepts the structure set out by my right hon. Friend the Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies), obviously he is conceding that the scheme will cost the Ministry more. Will he answer the specific point about the initial start-up cost? If we include the cost, readily admitted in the Bill, of £200 million to set up the private pension scheme, the transitional costs of £70 million, the extension to the fleet maintenance base, the setting up of a new supply organisation, and the possibility of having to establish a new accountancy organisation, we see that the costs in the first year will be more than £300 million.

Mr. Lamont: The costs will be nothing like that.

Mr. Brown: Tell us why not.

Mr. Lamont: If the hon. Gentleman will allow me to answer the questions, he will possibly see the substance of my position, even if he does not agree with it. He is wrong about pensions. The cost is merely the shifting of a liability which the Government would have incurred in any case. It is not additional public expenditure, because those liabilities already exist. Future pension contributions will be an addition to the public purse, and I shall come to that.

The right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen) asked about the new DGSR organisation. We are now assuming on a worst case basis that as many as 800 people could be involved. Hon. Members asked why that may be necessary. I hope that it will not be necessary. However, new tasks are being done which were not undertaken under the old organisation. There were no contracts before for ship refitting. There is the production of specifications in support of project contracts, the negotiation, placing and monitoring of contracts, and overseeing in the dockyards. Part will be placed in Bath, and part in the dockyards.

Mr. Douglas: Will the Minister confirm this mind-boggling statement, which appeared in the letter from C. M. Edwards, the director of contracts ship refitting:

"The Ministry of Defence has established DGSR as a new organisation to act for the customer and exercise day to day project management responsibility for the Term Contract and for individual project contracts."

Is it realistic to assume that the DGSR based in Bath or elsewhere will exercise day-to-day project management? The Minister shakes his head, but that is what the letter says. Do we already have a misleading document?

Mr. Lamont: The hon. Gentleman knows perfectly well that the customer organisation will not be managing projects as projects are at present managed in the dockyards. I hope that the customer organisation will not involve the sorts of numbers or costs that Opposition

Members have been talking about. We have been open about that, and have been making our arguments about savings on the worst case possibilities.

The hon. Member for Portsmouth, South (Mr. Hancock) and the right hon. Member for Llanelli said that we do not know what the efficiency savings will be, and challenged me to disclose them to the House. The right hon. Gentleman is far too clever for that. He knows perfectly well that I cannot tell the House what efficiency savings we are assuming because we do not want to inform contractors of that at this stage when we are just going out to tender. We do not want to tell them our assumptions for productivity increases and cost reductions. It would make no sense for us to display that to the world at the precise moment when we are asking companies to place competitive tenders and when we want to choose the best one in terms of productivity and efficiency. We have an assumption which is built into the figures and is behind the £21 million and £28 million savings after the overheads have been recovered.

The right hon. Gentlemen the Members for Llanelli and for Devonport made great play of the impact on the Defence Vote. The Ministry of Defence will incur certain costs which are not at present incurred. Obviously, the contributions to pensions will in future be paid for by the Ministry of Defence as an overhead, as is the case with all customers of companies. Customers often pay a company's overheads in the prices charged. No other part of the Government can pay. The Treasury cannot pay the pensions of a private sector company through the prices. Obviously, the Ministry of Defence must do that, and that has an effect on the Defence Vote. The real point is not the effect it will have on the Defence Vote, but rather the effect it will have on the defence programme, and this extra cost will be taken into account in the public expenditure survey and when we decide what the programme will be for the defence budget.

7.30 pm

The hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown), in another instance of his wild ideas about extra costs, spoke about the extra costs on a supply organisation, and he trotted out a figure of £46 million, saying that he had that sum on very good authority. I think that the hon. Gentleman was thinking of working group one, which was considering a possible need for proportionately higher stockholdings if the contractors decided to supply their own spares, and the possible value of the spares was assessed in the contract as being £46 million. However, that does not mean that an additional purchase must be involved, but simply that there would be a smaller reduction in the overall spare holdings so that operational support remained at an acceptable level. There again, just as elsewhere, the hon. Gentleman has been content to make wild allegations and exaggerations not based on fact. That was made clear to the hon. Gentleman in, I think, the Committee stage.

Mr. Gordon Brown: What is the point of duplicating these supply organisations?

Mr. Lamont: I explained to the hon. Gentleman on many occasions during the Committee stage that sometimes a contractor might wish and think it more efficient to have his own spares organisation and to provide them. However, the extra cost involved would be very small. At some time it could be that there would not be the access to that spares supply that there is at the moment from the naval base to the dockyard. That is the simple administrative point, but it does not involve a huge extra cost.

Hon. Members also asked various questions about consultants. I think that again a sum of £40 million was alleged by one hon. Member. Most of the money that has been spent on consultants has been spent on the setting up of commercial accounting systems. As I have said, that involves the purchase of hardware and software. The setting up of such systems has amounted to about £15 million, and the other support for consultants has amounted to £5 million, but that is all included within the £70 million initial costs. That cost, when it has been amortised, will result in savings to the Exchequer of £28 million, and of £21 million a year even before that.

Mr. Denzil Davies: The hon. Gentleman has said again that there will be an annual surplus to the Exchequer of £21 million a year over a period of 10 years. What will be the annual deficit to the Ministry of Defence budget over that 10 years? Will it not be about £20 million or £21 million every year over 10 years?

Mr. Lamont: I dealt with the point about the defence Vote. I said that there might be adjustments and that obviously certain factors had an impact on the defence Vote. I explained what those factors were, but I said that this matter would be taken into account by my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary when we determine what the Vote on the defence budget will be. The relevant point is that there will be savings to the Exchequer.

It is also relevant that everyone has agreed that there is a problem in the naval dockyards because of inefficiencies. Report after report has said that. Right hon. and hon. Gentlemen are not facing up to that fact, however much they complain about the costs of the changes that we are implementing. They have said that there are other ways of making the dockyards more efficient, but they should recognise that the costs to which I am now referring in answering questions would be incurred in any alternative solution as well. The only difference is that an alternative system would not work. We are the first Government who have faced the problem. To implement these efficiency measures is not a matter of dogma: it is simply common sense. It is of interest not just to taxpayers but to the armed forces and the Navy in getting a good service out of the naval dockyards. For that reason, I urge my right hon. and hon. Friends to reject the new clause.

Mr. O'Neill: Anyone who had not been on the Committee on the Bill and who was in doubt about why earlier we sought time to examine the information made available to us at such a late stage this afternoon will now understand our reasons, having heard the inadequacy of the Minister's reply. He commenced by talking about the amendment in the time-honoured way, saying that there could be shortcomings, that technical matters were involved, that the timing was not right, that the phraseology was incorrect, and so on. The Minister agrees to one of the later amendments. In that case he seeks to improve it himself by changing it. Therefore, if the Minister has difficulty with amendments, the remedy lies in his own hands.

The inadequacy of the Government's response this evening makes clear, first, that they do not really know how much the savings will be. As a last flourish, in what one imagined was the peroration of the Minister's speech, he referred to the inadequacy of any alternative solution to the problem, but he could not even tell us how much the commencement costs of a plc would be as against the option selected by the Government.

It has been broadly accepted by the Opposition (and the Minister has not chosen to refute this) that, starting last year, with a saving of £26 million, the figure had been whittled down by this February to £21 million, a figure which, on a turnover of about £400 million, barely makes the whole exercise worth the candle. As my hon. Friend the Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) said, it is barely worth the candle when we consider the bitterness caused, the deterioration in industrial relations, and the problems created for management in these yards.

So far, no attempt has been made to calculate how long it has taken for management and staff of the yards to explain to consultants what the changes will involve, nor has the time been calculated that it has taken for the contractors to have introduced to them the workings of the yards. What will be the likely costs in the months and years ahead when the members of middle management who are still there will be working out the essential work to be carried out in the yards? Those people will have to hold the hands of the contractors while they begin to find their way around this complex industrial organisation.

This evening we have heard that there is a possibility that the customer and supplier organisations will be based at perhaps Bath, Devonport or Rosyth. According to my hon. Friend the Member for Dunfermline, East, who has had an opportunity to read some of the material on this matter, some of the customer organisations will in fact be responsible for day to day operations. The Minister says that that is not so because such operations are far too detailed. One can imagine that that is why such an operation would be in Rosyth, Plymouth or Devonport in the first place. People could be in Bath and jump on the train to get quickly to other places if they had to go there as consultants. Frankly, we know that this is merely evidence of the lack of thought by the Minister and his colleagues.

We know that there has been no lack of effort on behalf of the 19 working groups, which have produced report after report. The problem is that these reports have not yet been properly quantified. The suggestion has been made that once a year, following contractorisation, this customer organisation will produce an annual report of such detail that we shall be able to see clearly the extent of the savings. In this connection, the quality of the responses from the Government would suggest that there is no likelihood that the annual report from the director general of ship refitting will allay our fears or clearly indicate to us what will be the costs and savings of the new organisation.

The Opposition have cited different costings. We need not just a report by the DGSR but a report on which the Comptroller and Auditor General can comment. The Public Accounts Committee said that it was not satisfied that there had been a close enough examination of the massive assets to which the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen) referred during his brief sojourn in the Chamber, which represent decades of investment by the Exchequer and the Ministry of Defence. A tuppence ha'penny report by the DGSR, perhaps from its headquarters in Bath with a couple of paragraphs produced in Rosyth and another couple in Plymouth, is not sufficient. These figures are not adequate.

The new clause specifically says that any savings of more than £100 must be brought to the attention of the House in an annual report. The Government's assurances are inadequate. I therefore ask hon. Members to join with us in support of the new clause. If the measure does nothing else for industrial relations in the dockyards and for the quality of the workmanship provided by the contractorised yard, it certainly will provide a modicum of protection for the taxpayers' massive investments. I hope that, in the long run, it will give the Navy the service enjoyed for centuries through our dockyards. That service has been jeopardised by the Government's cavalier approach.

Question put, That the clause be read a Second time:—

TRANSFERS OF SHARES IN COMPANIES PROVIDING DOCKYARD SERVICES

'Any contract made between the Secretary of State and any dockyard contractor shall contain a proviso requiring the transfer to a person or persons not resident in the United Kingdom of any shares in any company connected directly or indirectly with the provision of dockyard services by the dockyard contractor to be notified to the Secretary of State and where shares subject to such transfer exceed 5 per cent. in number or value of the total share capital of such company or companies, then the Secretary of State shall forthwith terminate the contract'.—[Mr. Denzil Davies.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Denzil Davies: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

New clause 2 is concerned with foreign ownership. I accept entirely that it is not easy to draft foolproof clauses, regulations or articles to cover such an area, and the Government will accept that that is not a defensive statement.

Our first criticism of the Government with regard to foreign ownership is that they have put nothing in the Bill to prevent the foreign ownership and control of assets of national strategic importance. That is not surprising because the Government do not care. They are prepared to sell off almost anything to cobble up a bit of money. The dockyards are an important national asset and I believe that there will be widespread support both in the House and in the country for ensuring that the dockyards do not fall into the hands of foreign countries.

In Committee, the Government said that it was not necessary to deal in the Bill with the question of foreign ownership. They said that their lawyers had come up with a complicated scheme to deal with the problem. No doubt the Minister or the Under-Secretary will tell the House — they have already told the Committee — what that scheme is.

As I understand the scheme, if 30 per cent. of the shares in any one of the consortium companies—I suspect at the end of the day there will be a consortium of some kind —become owned by foreigners, however they are to be defined, there will be some mechanism, at the discretion of the Secretary of State, for the contract to be terminated.

That would not happen automatically. The company apparently has a duty to notify the Ministry of Defence when the shareholding by foreigners has risen to 30 per cent. That is all that happens. Presumably the company will, out of the goodness of its heart, send a note to the Ministry to tell it that the company is now 30 per cent. owned by the Moscow Narodny bank nominees, or whoever it might be. At that point the Secretary of State may study the contract and consider whether he should terminate the contract.

Frankly, for all the high drafting and precision that appears on the surface, these provisions are worth little. They are purely cosmetic. They pretend that the Government are concerned about foreign ownership. The Government have not made a real effort. I shall try to show that. The new clause seeks to put that right.

Thirty per cent. is too high. Of course 30 per cent. is more than 25 per cent., but 25 per cent. is a magical figure when it comes to company law. A shareholding of 25 per cent. in effect represents, as the Government well know, control of a company. Such a holding can block a liquidation or it can block special resolutions. It is no coincidence that, some months ago, Sikorsky-Fiat was aiming for a 29 per cent. share of Westland but there were also stock exchange reasons. With a 29 per cent. shareholding, one is in the driving seat, especially if the other shares are spread widely. We are not talking about a company where 75 per cent. or 65 per cent. of the shares are held by one person. In consortiums such as Appledore International, Trafalgar House, the Weir Group and various other public quoted companies, there will be a wide spread of shares. It may well turn out that the foreign national or company owning 30 per cent. of shares would be the largest single shareholder, so 30 per cent. is far too high. It does not give the protection that is necessary. The new clause makes it clear that the figure that we would accept is 5 per cent. We accept that there will be changes in the shareholdings of companies from time to time and 5 per cent., as the lawyers say, is a kind of de minimis. That would be acceptable, but anything above that would not.

Secondly, the duty to notify the Ministry of Defence is far too weak. A legal duty to notify may be written into the contract, but I do not know how that can be enforced. Will the Ministry of Defence sue its contractor? What damage will the Ministry of Defence suffer? The duty to notify is not worth the paper it is written on. We have seen nothing in writing—I do not know whether the details are contained in the documents that we were presented with today—but the duty is to notify when the figure becomes 30 per cent. and it will be too late by then because the holding will have been built up. That really is bolting the stable door after the horse has gone.

The new clause reasonably points out that where there is a transfer of shares to a foreign resident or national— it is possible to find that out — there should be immediate notification, and where that transfer and others come to more than 5 per cent. the axe falls on foreign ownership. The 30 per cent. is too high a figure. The duty to notify is ridiculous, and it is too late at that point because the shareholding has been built up.

The third weakness in the Government's scheme is that the Secretary of State merely has a discretion to terminate the contract. A complex legal arrangement has been built up. The contract contains all the provisions. Lawyers have been richly paid to do all the drafting, yet at the end of the day the Secretary of State has a discretion to terminate a contract with his contractor. That is the only contractor that there is to repair the ships and that contractor's shareholding already stands at 30 per cent. If the contract were then terminated, somebody else would have to be found to do the work, with all the hassle that that would entail.

Does anybody believe that a Secretary of State for Defence would terminate such a contract because of the foreign holding? Certainly this Secretary of State would not. No, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that is nonsense. Ministers have worked hard. The Minister of State looked pained when I criticised his scheme and no doubt the Under-Secretary also feels that he has put long hours into this splendid piece of legal complexity. However, they should not take too much pride in it. It may be good in theory, but it makes no sense in practice.

The new clause provides for a termination of the contract at an earlier stage — when the shareholding stands at 5 per cent., not when it has been built up to 30 per cent. Clearly the Government must think about this again. They must take seriously the view that we must not allow any substantial shareholding from abroad in the royal dockyards. If they are not prepared to put a new clause into the Bill at this stage, such matters can be dealt with in the other place. The clause would be better in the Bill. That is where it should be. We do not accept that a shareholding of 30 per cent. provides the kind of safeguards that we require.

Mr. Hancock: The points on the new clause were well made in Committee and the right hon. Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies) spelt out the difficulties that could arise. We must consider the sort of situation in which we might find ourselves. What will happen if control of the royal dockyards falls into the hands of a foreign company holding at least 30 per cent. of the shareholdings? If the company refuses to drop a foreign-held shareholding the provisions in the Bill to terminate will then have to be put into practice. As the right hon. Gentleman said, what will happen to the work in progress? The one thing that we do know is that if the Bill is enacted there will be no turning back the clock. There will be no ready-made labour force and management to step in to fill the gap that will be created once one sets about trying to terminate a contract. What chance does that give of looking sensibly at the way in which the dockyards work? It will be an impossible situation. A seven-year contract may have run for three years when it has to be terminated and then other interested parties will have to be found. We know from Committee of the reluctance of many companies to look seriously at such a situation. More than one hon. Member suggested that strong arm tactics were being used to get people to show some interest. That would be par for the course should a contract be terminated.

It would be a grave dereliction of the Government's responsibility if they were not to act sensibly in the protection of the national interest and the defence of the realm and, more importantly, the conscious giving of control of something as important as our dockyards to foreign companies or people with hostile intent, whether politically or militarily, towards the United Kingdom.

I hope that hon. Members will see the sense of supporting new clause 2. It makes sense now and it did so in Committee. I have yet to hear a sustainable argument from the Government against it. I beg the House to support new clause 2.

Mr. Gordon Brown: The question is whether, in their enthusiasm to transfer the dockyards from public to private control, the Government are inadvertently creating conditions which may transfer the dockyards from British control to foreign control. In recent weeks Conservative Members have filled the House to discuss the importance of British control over the British car industry, and the Conservative party has been divided over who controls the British helicopter industry. Yet it is remarkable that not one Conservative Back-Bencher is present this evening, and only three Conservative Members are present on the Front Bench, when we are discussing legislation that contains not one safeguard against the possibility of foreign control of the royal dockyards. There is not one safeguard in the Bill to prevent or avert the possibility that a foreign company may be entrusted with the responsibility of refitting not only our sophisticated nuclear submarines but our nuclear deterrent. Despite hours of Committee debate on some of these matters and the presentation of various formulae and amended formulae by Ministers, none of my hon. Friends can be happy with any assurances that have been given about preventing foreign control when the Government are not prepared to include stipulations in the legislation.

Because there are to be no legal guarantees against foreign control, the Government have been retreating daily from their determination to prevent foreign control of the consortiums running either of the dockyards. The original position was set out by the Minister of State in the Second Reading debate on 2 December in response to a question from my right hon. Friend. He said:

"tenders would be sought from British companies."—[Official Report, 2 December 1985; Vol. 88, c. 98.]

The assumption that underlay our initial discussion of the Dockyard Services Bill was that no company other than a British-owned and British-registered one would be in a position to bid for the dockyard franchise.

During Committee stage a revised position was presented by the Parliamentary Under-Secretary. He said that to avoid the possibility of foreign control the Government would introduce a stipulation that no more than 30 per cent. of the shares of the consortium could be in the hands of a foreign firm. When we asked how he would eliminate foreign firms that might be interested in the dockyard franchise, and deal with other problems, he said:

"The answer . . . is that the problem will be picked up at the pre-qualification stage, which we are now moving towards."

That stage has come and gone. On the list of companies being invited to tender for the royal dockyards, exclusively as a single company and not as part of a consortium, is a wholly owned American company. The assurance that the problem would be picked up at pre-qualification stage was a bland one. It was one on which the Minister has not yet been able to deliver, at least in the parliamentary answers that he has given.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State then redefined the position again. In reply to a question in Committee he said:

"It would be theoretically possible for Foster Wheeler,"—

a wholly owned American company—

"or another foreign company, to satisfy the shareholding requirements but come in with financial rather than commercial trading partners."—[Official Report, Standing Committee D; 30 January 1986, c. 376.]

In other words, for all operational purposes the controlling interest could be a wholly owned American company, for technical purposes holding only 29 per cent. or 29·5 per cent. of the shares, but being the only company with the technical expertise that would allow it to succeed in winning the contract.

At first, no foreign companies whatsoever were to tender. Now, the Minister is apparently prepared to contemplate a foreign-owned company bidding for the franchise, going beyond the pre-qualification stage, choosing a few banks and financial institutions to back up its application and to satisfy the shareholding requirement, and being effectively in control of the dockyards at Devonport or Rosyth.

8.15 pm

It is a situation unique in the Western world where an American-owned company that is not in a position to bid for the contracts to run the American shipyards and dockyards is somehow placed in an advantaged position to bid for the contract for the British dockyards. Neither America nor any European country would contemplate the refitting of its most sophisticated nuclear weapons already in commission by a consortium with a substantial foreign shareholding.

Some of us have had a chance to look, if only briefly, at the documents issued to companies over the past few days. Annexe 4.2 is of special interest. It is headed:

"Proposed conditions governing foreign shareholdings in the dockyard company."

It contains the Government's definition of a foreign corporation that would be able to hold up to 30 per cent. of the shares in a consortium running the royal dockyards. In the list of possible foreign corporations to hold shares in the dockyard, we find:

"A Government or Governmental Department or Government agency or body other than of the United Kingdom or any part thereof".

In other words, as well as the fact that, under this legislation and the Minister's own regulations, a foreign, private company may be able to hold up to 30 per cent. of the shares in the consortium, it is also possible that a foreign Government could hold up to 30 per cent. of the shares in the royal dockyards. As far as Britain is concerned we are transferring control from public to private hands, but apparently the Government can contemplate the possibility that another state—perhaps Libya, Argentina or South Africa or another of the countries that might be interested in having refit work done at the dockyards—could become part of the consortium running the royal dockyards. That is the effect of the Minister's statement.

Conservative Members seemed to be concerned about the future of Westland. They seemed determined to keep British Leyland under British control for strategic—they said—as well as financial and employment reasons. I cannot understand how they are prepared to contemplate the possibility of a foreign Government being the major party with a controlling operational interest in the running of the dockyards. Yet in one of the last sittings of the Committee the Minister of State told us that the only sensible criticism that might be made of these arrangements was that they were too restrictive. In other words, he seems to think that it would be better to open the floodgates, to allow foreign companies to hold a higher proportion of the shares, to let foreign Governments do what they want with the royal dockyards and to allow a strategic asset to fall into other people's hands. That is the effect of the statement that he made when we were discussing the stipulations governing foreign control of the franchise.

It is small wonder that the hon. Member for Plymouth, Sutton (Mr. Clark), the Minister for Trade, is not here today. I gather that he has stated to the local newspaper that he is not here because he would be too embarrassed at having to vote against the Third Reading of the Bill. As the Minister may already know, the Minister for Trade has written to the trade unions at Plymouth dockyard saying that his real apprehension is that the fate of the dockyards might be decided by people with no interest in or experience of conditions in the city of Plymouth, and that a great asset may be sold into the hands of strangers.

Perhaps the hon. Member for Sutton, who has had to be silent in debates on this matter in the House, will carry some weight with the Prime Minister when the final decision is made on whether to go ahead with the Bill.

I note that the hon. Gentleman also told the trade unions that "there remains the possibility of a number of detailed changes to the Bill in its passage both in the Commons and in the Lords".

It is precisely such changes that we are proposing today.

Mr. Denzil Davies: The hon. Member for Plymouth, Sutton (Mr. Clark) may not be the only one who has deserted the Government on this issue. There are no Conservative Members on the Back Benches.

Mr. Brown: I do not think that the Government can call on any physical support today outside the Division Lobbies. It is noticeable that some hon. Members from the south-west, whom one might have expected to be here, have absented themselves from the Chamber and also from the Division Lobby. It may be that more hon. Members than the 10 who abstained on Second Reading will abstain on Report and Third Reading. It is a sign of the declining support for the Bill that the Minister who who should be going through the Lobby as a loyal Government supporter has made a public statement to the effect that he could not support the Bill in the Lobby this evening. I mean the Minister for Trade. It is clear that the Minister of State for Defence Procurement is a loyal supporter of the Government and will support them no matter what they say and no matter what wrongs they are doing to our defence forces.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies) mentioned another problem associated with the dangers of foreign control. He mentioned the possibility that during the period of a seven-year contract a greater amount of foreign shares may be put into the consortium. We have to remember that the Ministry of Defence is not committed to re-tendering every seven years. All it wants to retain is the right to re-tender every seven years. The Minister of State was quite clear on 2 December on Second Reading. Where the consortium became subject to foreign influence he said:

"In such conditions it would be written into the contract that the company would lose the contract to manage the yards".—[Official Report, 2 December 1985; Vol. 88, c. 98.]

That seemed a clear statement that the contract would contain a clause not that the company might lose the contract to manage the yard but would lose the contract. That statement has been evacuated by the Minister. On 30 January the Under-Secretary told the Committee something totally different. Looking at a number of options open to him in circumstances where a consortium became subject to foreign control, he said:

"The third option would perhaps be to allow the new situation to continue as it was in the overall interests of national security . . . Here, we would obviously take account of the time left for the contract to run, the adequacy of the contractor's performance to date and the nature of the foreign influence involved."—[Official Report, Standing Committee D, 30 January 1986; c. 375.]

In other words, what the Minister said on 2 December is meaningless. It is not something that the Government are prepared to hold to. He misled the House on 2 December and I hope that he will apologise to the House for a statement that has not been justified by events in Committee or by the proposed conditions governing foreign shareholding in the dockyard company. That is a five-page statement which has been sent to the contractors. It goes into great detail about what constitutes a foreign consortium and a foreign shareholding and what 30 per cent. means. It defines foreign corporations, foreign shareholdings and project contracts. It defines what an "interest" is, and what a Government nominee is. It goes into all that detail and then says that if the contractor or the consortium raises its share above the 30 per cent. limit and does not reduce its shares, if there are transfers of shares between parent companies, if directorships change and we have foreign directors in control the answer is that the authority, meaning the Government, may in their entire discretion terminate the agreement. It does not say would or will but may. In other words, what was said to the House on 2 December by the Minister of State is proved not to be what the Government are now saying to the company. Therefore, no matter what the level of foreign control, what sort of consortium emerges during the period of a contract, how many foreign directors there are or how many foreign Governments buy 5 per cent. or 10 per cent. of shares in the consortium, the Government are leaving it open to decide whether they will or will not leave the dockyard consortium in foreign hands.

That emphasises the point that if the conditions governing foreign control are not enshrined in the legislation we will have evasion and retreat even from the bland assurances that Ministers have given during our debate.

This not an academic argument. One foreign company is already expressing interest. There is the possibility that consortia may be made up by other foreign partners. The Government should realise that there is no more important strategic asset for the maintenance, repair and refit of our defence forces than the royal dockyards. If it is inconceivable that any other country would pass the control of its dockyards from its own native control to foreign control, it should be unacceptable to the Government to allow a foreign consortium to be in a position to be the major partner, no matter what shares it holds, in running British dockyards.

As usual, Ministers wear the clothes of patriots but leave those clothes oddly empty. Having got into a situation where our helicopter industry has passed, in the main, into foreign control, along with many of our other assets, it is the last straw for the Opposition to see the dockyards being put in a position where, inadvertently, through Government neglect and negligence they too may pass into foreign control. If the Government are serious about retaining the dockyards as a British asset for the use of the British defence forces, they would include in the legislation a clause preventing foreign control of the consortia or even a substantial share in the consortia.

The dockyard planning team reports still mention the possibility of refits for foreign navies. Argentina and South Africa are still part of the list that the Ministry of Defence seems prepared to contemplate. If the dockyards are to do work for foreign navies, the least we can expect is that they are not under foreign control. I believe that the Minister should take to heart the warnings that have been given by the Minister for Trade and should accept amendments to the Bill here before the other place includes them as part of its deliberations. If the Government were serious about retaining British control, they would accept the amendment moved by my right hon. Friend the Member for Llanelli.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence Procurement (Mr. John Lee): In essence new clause 2 seeks to provide that the contract between my Department and the successful bidders for the management of the dockyards will provide that if shares in any company directly or indirectly connected with the provision of dockyard services by the dockyard contractor are transferred to someone not resident in the United Kingdom my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State should be notified. Where the transfer exceeds 5 per cent. in number or value, my right hon. Friend should terminate the contract.

I say with the greatest respect to the right hon. Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies) and his hon. Friends that this is a narrow, unrealistic and unnecessary reaction. On the assumption that the amendment has been drafted to mean what it says, I doubt very much whether it would even achieve what the right hon. Gentleman and his hon. Friends hope. It is by no means certain that the new clause would prevent any number of transfers, providing each was below the magical 5 per cent. figure, which could result in a transfer to foreign ownership in small stages.

Nor is the new clause very specific about which company or companies it is seeking to constrain. The wording refers to "Any company connected directly or indirectly with the provision of dockyard services by the dockyard contractor".

Again, I say with respect that that is pretty loose wording. I shall explain why I believe it is not only loose but misguided. It certainly has very little to do with preventing foreign control of the dockyards which it is clear from what Opposition Members have said is their concern, and the purpose of the new clause.

The clause is also wholly inflexible and as soon as the very low level limit which it sets of the transfer of more than 5 per cent. of the shareholding of any company to non-UK residents is reached, the contract with the dockyard company must be terminated "forthwith". There is no question here of any discretion. There is no question of determining whether such a shareholding amounted to foreign influence—much less foreign control—in the dockyards. There is no question of considering whether any harm would be done to national security or other interests as a result of such a foreign shareholding. The wording of new clause 2 is simply a knee-jerking reaction, typical of the sort of opinions increasingly emerging from the Opposition that if it is foreign it must be bad. Or worse, it is an example of even more anti-Americanism on the part of the Opposition.

Let me make it quite clear that safeguarding national security interests has always been, and will remain, a vital concern in our policy of introducing commercial management into the dockyards. I can say without any hesitation that the idea that what we are proposing somehow puts national security at risk is absolute nonsense. In a moment I shall outline, for the benefit of those who were not on the Standing Committee, what we propose. I am sure that all those who, unlike some Opposition Members, are prepared to listen will accept that we are taking the sort of steps on foreign shareholding that any prudent Government should take.

8.30 pm

The new clause moved by the right hon. Member for Llanelli is at best unclear which company and to what extent it is seeking to constrain. Taken literally, any purchases of even a minute shareholding by an overseas resident in the parent company of the managing company —for example, just two shares in Trafalgar House plc or Babcock International plc—would have to be notified to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State.

[Mr. John Lee]

Our proposals require my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to form a Companies Act company at each dockyard. Each company will have an authorised share capital of £50,001, divided into 50,000 ordinary shares of £1 each and one special share of £1 which my right hon. Friend will retain. The 50,000 shares will be transferred on vesting day to a managing company which will either be whichever company has been successful in tendering to manage that dockyard for the initial period of seven years or, where a consortium has been successful, it will be a company formed and owned by the consortium. All 50,000 shares will be owned for that entire period by the managing company. It is not our intention that anyone other than the managing company should hold those 50,000 shares and that will be in the contract. In the articles of association of the company which my right hon. Friend forms at each dockyard, he will make provision for a special share to be held by or on behalf of himself. The rights attached to that share will ensure that no change is made to the articles of the company or to its memorandum without my right hon. Friend's approval. No change in the ownership of the shares in the dockyard company may be registered without my right hon. Friend's approval. However, I have already said that ownership of the shares in the dockyard company must, under the contract, remain with the managing company for the period of the contract.

On foreign control, therefore, one must consider also the managing companies. I must stress here that we do not propose the privatisation of the dockyards and the transfer to a private company of Government assets. Anyone would think, from the speeches of Opposition Members, that we intend to give away or sell the assets. They will be retained in public hands. To that extent, constraints on foreign shareholdings which were relevant to, for example, British Aerospace are not relevant to the dockyards. In this case, the Ministry of Defence will retain the ownership of the land, buildings, plant and equipment and we shall retain the right to change contractors at the end of the seven-year contract.

As to the protection of information about our naval refitting programme, including — Opposition Members referred especially to this in Committee — information related to nuclear aspects, I can assure the House that the controls which apply to other defence industries—many of which are no less vital to our security than are the dockyards—will apply in full to all companies involved. These controls are those which apply to list X companies, and they have ensured that there has been no threat to national security from, for example, the involvement of companies in our nuclear and other weapons programmes or in the construction of nuclear submarines.

Following the pre-qualification exercise which my Department carried out earlier this year, we published the names of those companies which we would be inviting to tender for the contracts. Last week, the invitation-to-tender documents were issued for Devonport, to a consortium of Trafalgar House, Plessey, A & P Appledore, and to the management-led Devonport Dockyard Limited; and for Rosyth to the Babcock International/Thorn EMI consortium, the Balfour Beatty Weir group consortium, Press Offshore and Northern Engineering Industries.

Of course, the dockyards are of unique strategic importance, and for that reason cannot be regarded in the same way as any other defence contractor. We have made it clear that we could not accept that the dockyards should be run by foreign companies because of the obvious necessity to protect security interests. The relevant concern, with which the contract will deal, is the shareholding and management structure of the managing company which will, for the period of the contract, own and therefore control the dockyard company employing the work force. Annexed to the invitation to tender, a copy of which has been placed in the Library of the House as hon. Members will gather from earlier deliberations — perhaps better late than never — are draft contractual clauses relating to foreign control. Although they are no more than draft clauses, the principles upon which they operate will not significantly change. Those clauses define, for the purposes of the contract, key terms such as "foreign corporation" and "corporation under foreign control".

I accept that one can debate the shareholding which represents "control" of a company. We are really considering influence and the meaningful control which that may give. It is not, however, as simple as Opposition Members suggest. A shareholder who has 20 per cent. of the issued shares in a company may have considerable influence where no one else has more than 5 per cent.; however, a 20 per cent. interest in the shares of the company having four other shareholders each of whom also has 20 per cent. could hardly be described as a controlling influence. In terms of voting powers at a general meeting, the ability to exercise 51 per cent. of the shares voting is regarded as control. As I have said, for British Aerospace, foreign participation in share capital has been limited to 15 per cent. In yet other contexts, 30 per cent. has been considered to be the shareholding giving rise to control—that is the shareholding in a publicly quoted company at which a mandatory bid must be made under City rules.

Our view is that, given the other safeguards to which I referred—the articles of the companies set up by my right hon. Friend, the fact that without his consent significant articles cannot be changed and shares cannot be transferred, the tried and tested protection which list X procedures afford — the shareholding in the managing company at which we consider, in normal circumstances, a risk to security may begin to arise is 30 per cent.

This is the foregn shareholding in the managing company to which we expect we will, in the interests of security, expect tenderers to conform at the initial bid stage. But whatever the tenderer's proposals are, we shall examine them to satisfy ourselves that security interests will not be prejudiced. If we think that is their effect, we shall not agree to them.

Opposition Members may ask how we shall determine whether shareholding in the managing company is foreign. The answer is that we will look at the parent company which holds it. Under the contract, my right hon. Friend will be entitled to assume, unless the parent company establishes otherwise, that any share in it is foreign held. If foreign held shares in the parent company exceed 30 per cent. it will be considered under the contract to be a corporation under foreign control, and the shares which it will hold in the managing company will also be considered foreign owned. If the parent company is foreign registered, or if its principal place of business is abroad, it will be considered to be a foreign corporation, resulting in its shares in the managing company also being considered foreign held. We are, therefore, not excluding foreign owned or registered companies or their United Kingdom subsidiaries from joining a consortium to bid to manage the dockyards, though their shares in the managing company will be considered foreign for the purposes of the 30 per cent. level.

The final question to consider is what would happen if the proportion of the foreign shareholding were to rise above the 30 per cent. level. My hon. Friend said on Second Reading that if a company which had been awarded the contract came under foreign control, it would be written into the contract that the company would lose the contract to manage the yards. My hon. Friend went on to say that the precise proportion of shareholding had not then been defined. We have, as I have just said, decided to place the "trigger point" in the managing company at 30 per cent. The contract would not automatically be terminated, but the important point is that the parent company or companies could not assume that it would continue.

Mr. Denzil Davies: The Minister referred to the duty on the company to inform the Secretary of State when shares reach the 30 per cent. level. What sanction does the Secretary of State have on a company if it fails to carry out that duty?

Mr. Lee: If the company fails to carry out that duty of notifying the Secretary of State, and if my right hon. Friend believes that there is a real concern about national security, he can, at his discretion, terminate the contract.

Mr. Gordon Brown rose——

Mr. Lee: If my right hon. Friend considered that the degree of foreign shareholding was contrary to the interests of security and that action should be taken, he could terminate the contract—and the company would know that. Alternatively, the parent company might be required to reduce the level of foreign shareholding. If, however, my right hon. Friend did not consider that the circumstances were contrary to the interests of security, the management contract would be allowed to continue.

Mr. Brown: Will the Minister explain why, on 2 December, the Minister of State told the House that in conditions of foreign influence and control

"it would be written into the contract that the company would lose the contract to manage the yards."—[Official Report, 2 December 1985; Vol. 88, c. 38.]

Mr. Lee: With great respect, I have already covered that point. I explained that the precise percentage for the trigger mechanism had not be defined at that stage.

May I make it clear that in my comments I have dealt with what has been of principal concern in the debate on this new clause, namely, foreign control or influence by virtue of shareholding. The draft foreign control clauses, which are both complex and comprehensive, also address the issue of foreign influence at board level of the managing company. So far as that is concerned, it is our intention that if 30 per cent. or more of the directors of the managing company or the votes they exercise are, to put it very generally, subject to the influence of foreigners or foreign corporations or parent companies under foreign control, my right hon. Friend may act in the same way under the contract as he can if the specified foreign shareholding level has been reached. But, that said, we are not banning foreign directors per se.

I should add that a further contractual safeguard will exist. Whether or not the 30 per cent. limit affecting the shareholding or board of the managing companies has been passed, my right hon. Friend will retain the power to terminate the contract where security interests justify it if, in his opinion,

"any other circumstances whatsoever have arisen which constitute any foreign ownership, control or influence over the managing company".

The potential danger associated with foreign control can and will be avoided by the combined effect of the articles of association of the dockyard companies in which my right hon. Friend will retain a special share, by the standard security procedures covering all defence contracts, and by clauses in the contract giving my Department powers of termination if the degree of foreign control is such as to cause my right hon. Friend to consider that the interests of security are in any way threatened.

I therefore invite the House, with confidence, to reject the new clause.

Mr. O'Neill: Perhaps the Minister can answer one question before he gets too comfortable. He read out a list of companies that had passed the prequalifying stages, but he omitted any reference to Foster Wheeler. Am I right to assume that that wholly owned American company is no longer interested in bidding for the contract for either of the yards?

Mr. Lee: Although I had finished my speech, I am charitable, and am glad to respond as the point has already been raised once. Foster Wheeler is a list X company. It therefore satisfied the prequalification exercise. But it was not sent an invitation to tender because it is a foreign company and it has not formed itself into a consortium that we would find acceptable. Therefore, it is at present a non-runner.

Mr. O'Neill: Although I wish to avoid the charge of being anti-American, the Opposition can at least take some satisfaction from the fact that we exposed a foreign-owned company that was not prepared to change its terms and articles of association, and that as a result it has backed off or been discouraged from applying for the contract.

Due to lack of time, we have been unable to study the provision with the care that the Under-Secretary of State has been able to give it. However, I understand that it contains a catch-all clause to the effect that if the Secretary of State does not, for any reason, like the look of a company, he can terminate the contract in the middle of the seven-year period. It seems unfair and unjust that a company can virtually be subject to the Secretary of State's whim. If it does something that he does not like, there does not seem to be any form of appeal. There is no clear indication of what procedures would be established for examining——

Mr. Norman Lamont: Would the hon. Gentleman care to sort himself out with the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown)? The hon. Member for Dunfermline, East has complained that the Government's proposal is far too flexible, and says that we need a catch-all automatic mechanism, but the hon. Member for Clackmannan (Mr. O'Neill) wants the exact opposite.

Mr. O'Neill: I am grateful to the Minister for showing such interest in a debate in which he has not been participating. However, my hon. Friend the Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) did not have the opportunity to hear what the Minister said earlier.

The initial burden of our attack—and it remains the same—was that the figure of 30 per cent. is too high. But, at the end of his speech, the Under-Secretary of State seemed to say that 30 per cent. did not matter, and that the figure could be 1 per cent. If the directors had some sort of brainstorm and started acting in a manner characteristic of foreign nationals, he seemed to say that such a company would be debarred from retaining the contract. But our view is not narrow or unrealistic. We say that a figure of 5 per cent. should be set and that if it is exceeded the Secretary of State should allow termination. We believe that the 5 per cent. figure would provide such a low threshold that the Ministry of Defence would have no difficulty in establishing when it had been breached.

I understand that at present the 30 per cent. level is dependent upon the company letting the Secretary of State know that its shareholding has fallen into foreign hands. The Under-Secretary of State has not disputed the fact that 25 per cent. could give control of a company. As has been pointed out, in such circumstances the figure of 30 per cent. is too high. The recent tangles experienced by the Ministry of Defence and the Department of Trade and Industry with British company law and the ownership of companies suggests that in some circumstances 25 per cent. could easily be recognised as giving control over the company.

We therefore chose what lawyers would call the de minimis figure of 5 per cent. It has a precedent; it affords adequate policing and would enable us to be sure about the companies that we wanted to deal with. There could be no possibility of dawn raids and take-overs of companies unbeknownst even to the directors. The failure of the Department of Trade and Industry adequately to police take-overs and mergers gives us little confidence in the Minister's vague assurances. Given present Government policy, there is no likelihood of the Government exercising any powers that they reserve to themselves under that catch-all provision. This is no more than a bit of sophistry on their part.

We believe that if our defence interests are to be adequately protected, there must be an upper limit of 5 per cent. It would be easily understood by the contracting companies and by the work force. Indeed, workers would be very distressed at the prospect of being employed by those who did not necessarily have the best interests of Britain's defence at heart. Therefore, I ask Conservative Members to join my right hon. and hon. Friends, whom I know will vote in great numbers, in supporting the new clause.

EQUALITY OF PENSION RIGHTS

'Where in pursuance of the arrangements referred to in section 1(2) hereof a qualified dockyard service employee ceases to be employed in the Civil Service of the Crown and becomes employed by a company all pension arrangements made by such company shall be equivalent in all respects to such pension arrangements as applied in the Civil Service of the Crown.'— [Mr. O'Neill.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. O'Neill: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): With this we may discuss new clause 4—Redundancy Fund: payments for dockyard workers—

'In pursuance of the arrangements made hereunder the Secretary of State shall out of money provided by Parliament set up a redundancy fund for the benefit of all qualified dockyard employees declared redundant after the transfer of the dockyard undertaking and payments made out of such fund shall be no less in amount and value than payments that otherwise would have been made under the Superannuation Act 1972.'.

Mr. O'Neill: New clauses 3 and 4 relate to the pension rights and redundancy arrangements which employees of the new contracting companies are likely to experience. We want to afford such employees the same conditions of employment as prevail in the Civil Service. We would like to think that there would be no diminution in pension rights.

For most working people, pensions are merely deferred wages. They are in many respects the only savings that many working people make. The savings are held in trust by management. It is sometimes suggested that they are provided by the grace and favour of management, but they are sometimes a substitute for pay and better conditions. People are often encouraged to accept the possibility of a pension on retirement in preference to a 1 or 2 per cent. increase in wages.

[Mr. O'Neill]

Pensions are often a barrier to mobility. That argument might be stronger in days of full employment, but pensions are nevertheless a consideration when a worker contemplates moving to other employment. Management are often prepared to pay in future for the advantage of lower wage bills today and a stable work force such as is established when people regard a good pension as a barrier to mobility.

The pension arrangements that have been granted to public service employees have become a right. The result of contractorisation is a denial of a right. The pension arrangements presently enjoyed by the work force in the dockyards are not privileges but rights and they should not be removed at the whim of legislators. It could be said that the removal of such basic employment rights is nothing more or less than expropriation without adequate consultation. Those who are in employment bitterly resent the fact that the terms and conditions of anybody who is recruited after contractorisation will be inferior to the rights enjoyed by those who are already employed.

New clause 4 provides for a redundancy fund for dockyard workers. If there are redundancies after contractorisation, the new clause will provide adequate financial provision for them. Anybody who is made redundant after contractorisation will be provided for at a level which is not inferior to that provided for those dockyard workers who will be made redundant in the next few weeks or months. We know that 3,000 voluntary redundancies are being sought.

When privatisation takes place, there is usually a considerable reduction in the labour force. We have discussed the savings and the costs which could be incurred after contractorisation. There is disagreement about how the savings could be achieved, but it is not disputed that if any savings are to be achieved they will probably be achieved by a reduction in the dockyard work force.

There has been privatisation in other areas of defence, most notably in the case of the royal ordnance factories. The amount of money that has been provided for redundancy payments has been almost exhausted. Additional funds will probably have to be provided from one source or another. Because of the nature of the contracting companies and their relationship with the employing organisations, if there have to be further redundancies, apart from those which have already been announced prior to contractorisation, they will probably be achieved only at the expense of the redundancy payments which are now being offered to the work force. The new clause is being moved to ensure that redundancy payments will continue to be made at the present level.

The Minister did not suggest that more money will be made available for those individuals. A fair number of the redundancies that have been called for will probably be achieved. When large numbers of redundancies are called for, many of the older employees seek what is really early retirement. However, the contracting companies could run out of older men who are prepared to take early retirement. The amount of redundancy money that is provided then becomes a critical factor in the negotiations on labour reductions. Certainly we have not yet been satisfied by the Government's remarks this afternoon. I use the word "remarks" because the Government have been extremely coy about being specific on any figures. They have said that, for reasons of commercial confidentiality and for other reasons, they are not prepared to be specific as to the sums involved.

For the people who are at present employed in the firm, this must be extremely distressing, and new clause 4, in respect of a redundancy fund, is an attempt to allay the fears and anxieties of some members of the work force who believe that they could be told that their jobs no longer existed and that the rates of compensation for the service that they have given to the dockyards would not be on all fours with what is being paid at the moment.

These two new clauses deal with the problems that have occurred with previous privatisation. So far the Government have said that, by and large, they hope that there will be no deterioration in the working conditions enjoyed by workers after the protection of, in this case, the Civil Service is removed. Frankly, we are not reassured by the Government's remarks on these matters. We feel that, if they mean what they say, they ought to be giving effect to their words by having far stiffer provisons in this piece of enabling legislation.

The absence of these provisions and commitments required us to place new clauses 3 and 4 on the Amendment Paper, and we hope that hon. Members on all sides of the House will support them. They have been welcomed by the representatives of the work people, who see them as filling a gap in the present proposals. I believe that they will go some way towards alleviating the difficulties which any contracting company will have to face. As we have said, many costs can be calculated, but one of the major difficulties which a contracting company will face is resentment, and the suspicion that it will be trying to make savings and profits not just out of more effective and efficient work practices but out of the work people themselves.

It is for these reasons that we believe that it would make a substantial contribution to improving industrial relations if there were adequate provision for pensions and redundancy arrangements in any future contractorisation scheme. We are not confident that the existing financial framework within these companies will provide anything like the opportunities for profit which the Government are suggesting. We fear that these opportunities for profit, if they are to be created, will be created at the expense of the wages, conditions, redundancy arrangements and pensions of the work force.

I therefore commend these new clauses to the House in the hope that, in the interest of better industrial relations, they will be accepted.

Mr. Hancock: In Committee, when this part of the Bill was discussed, the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State said that the Government intended to set up arrangements which mirrored the existing pension and redundancy arrangements. That sounded very good at the time, but we have yet to get clarification of exactly what he intended to do. The new clause gives an opportunity for the House to give the reassurance which is undoubtedly needed by the work force both in Rosyth and in Devonport.

The Minister should accept the new clauses because he has already committed the Government, if we are to believe what he told us in Committee, to maintaining a pension scheme that is the same as the Civil Service scheme that operates at present and that dockyard employees are now in, so that there should be no detrimental effects upon them. I think that we have to insist that we get clarification of exactly what will happen.

New clause 3 simply guarantees that the pension rights of dockyard employees transferred to a new company will remain the same as they have been in the Civil Service. That is not too much to ask for anybody who has given dedicated service to the Government in the dockyards. I hope that we can consider that, not with sympathy but with realism, and agree that that sort of assurance about protected pension rights is essential. As the hon. Member for Clackmannan (Mr. O'Neill) said, for many people the pension at the end of a working career is critical when considering employment. Many people would like the norm in Government service to continue, and have a right to it.

As they stand, the conditions of service for dockyard workers transferred to a new company will not be adequately protected. That applies particularly to pension arrangements, and we seek to clarify that today. Time and again the dockyard unions have spouted out to Opposition Members, and, indeed, to every member of the Committee, information about their anxieties over the future pension rights of their members.

New clause 4 follows the same line, and guarantees redundancy payments equivalent to the present arrangements funded by the Government under the Superannuation Act 1972. The Government intend to negotiate with the contracting companies arrangements which are as good as those applicable under the personal Civil Service pension scheme. Again, we seek assurance that that is exactly what will happen, and that the contracting companies will accept that, not as a negotiating right, but as a built-in part of contractual arrangements, and will guarantee the rights and future redundancy payments of the work force.

Earlier, we heard of the problems that could occur if a sizeable percentage of the company was taken over by foreign interests. When we asked the Minister what action the Government would take if that happened, he said clearly that it would mean termination. If termination means redundancy, as I fear it undoubtedly will in some cases, the House has an obligation today to ensure that the redundancy payments due to those people are no different from what they are today.

I hope that the House sees the logic and sense behind that, and the need for fair play in guaranteeing the work force their pension rights and redundancy payments. There can be no alternative. The House must accept the two new clauses and vote for their inclusion in the Bill.

Mr. Douglas: It is difficult for the House to realise what is involved in the passage of the Bill. This is the first time in any form of privatisation that, not the physical assets of the dockyards, but the labour force is being transferred from the Ministry of Defence. The concept involves a managing company with the dockyard companies' only assets, to use the word loosely, the employees. The managing companies will take over the dockyard companies as wholly owned subsidiaries.

When we probed the Minister in Committee about pensions, and particularly redundancies, he gave us the impression that the financial background of any consortium taking over the dockyard companies and its ability to fund any subsequent redundancies would be carefully examined. There is no evidence in the tendering documents or from inquiries that that sort of searching investigation has taken or will take place.

In relation to what the companies are asked to do in terms of redundancies, I quote from the invitation to tender and main annexes:

> "Details of redundancy provisions which were transferred under TUPE '81 and which should be taken into account by tenderers . . . are in annex 6/4."

Annexe 6/4 uses a startling phrase in relation to new entrants:

> "The level of redundancy scheme benefits shall be consistent as far as possible with that applicable to other employees of the contractor and with good practice within related sectors of industry."

What exactly does that mean in terms of the redundancy scheme? The first blow, as it were, can be taken by the public purse. We understand that. We understand in relation to Rosyth and Devonport that the redundancy payments are those expected by Civil Service employees.

The next tranche theoretically would be taken by the public purse because the sums passed on in terms of the Bill would be passed on in one way or another to the dockyard employing companies, although the dockyard employing companies would have a shareholding of only 50,000 plus one golden share. However, assuming that some of these companies employ individuals, there is no obligation to have these redundancy provisions for the new entrants on all fours with the existing employment of the dockyard company. All that is understood by the contractor is that the redundancy provisions for the new entrants would be consistent as far as possible with those in his employment, not with those employed by the dockyard company.

This is an important distinction. There is a possibility under the tender documents of having two classes of employee. We must decide whether to take these documents seriously. We got them only this afternoon and, because we have to read them quickly, we may get the wrong idea. Earlier this evening, I alluded to the DGSR being responsible for day-to-day project management, and the Minister of State, in his wisdom, shook his head and said that that would not happen. Should we take these documents seriously or not?

I put it to the Minister that under the tender documents it is possible to have two classes of employee. Such a situation will certainly produce many effects, but it will not produce harmony in the dockyards. The Minister of State is obligated at this late stage of the Bill to give us some assurances. He must give the employees some assurances about the long-term prospects in relation to pension rights and redundancy payments.

If there are to be two classes of employee, let us hear about it here and now; let us not have any pussy-footing about. Let us hear that this House is passing an enabling Bill to give the Government some authority to say to contractors, "The first time around, be good boys and everyone must be on all fours with the existing Civil Service arrangements but later, even during the period of the seven-year contract, you could have two classes of employee.". The right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen) raised an important point about the next round. The same contractor might not be fortunate —or unfortunate—enough to bid in terms of continuity. What happens then to the redundancy scheme? Do we then have to accept a redundancy and/or pension scheme that is consistent with the best practices within industry? The Government are trying by sleight of hand to make savings through cheeseparing with pension arrangements or redundancy provisions. We are dubious about those savings.

[Mr. Douglas]

I support the thrust of the two new clauses. The Minister of State has the opportunity to clear the air now before the Bill goes to the other place.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The criticisms of the hon. Member for Clackmannan (Mr. O'Neill) were essentially the same, although in a slightly lower key, as the criticisms made in Committee. I cannot satisfy hon. Members in every respect, but I believe that the anxieties and fears expressed in Standing Committee were exaggerated. Much of what was said about the possibility of worsening conditions of employment was unfounded. I did not and I do not want to give rise to unnecessary fears.

In providing for the introduction of commercial management in the dockyards, the Bill treats the transfer of employees to the dockyard companies as a transfer to which the Transfer of Undertakings (Protection of Employment) Regulations 1981 apply. Those regulations essentially safeguard employees' rights when a business or undertaking is transferred to a new owner—thus the new owner takes over the contracts of employment of all the employees. There is no picking and choosing. All the collective agreements are in force. It is as though the contracts of employment with the previous employer had from the start been made with the new employer. This means, for individual dockyard employees, that, on their first day of employment with the new dockyard company, with the exception of some aspects deriving directly from Crown service, their terms and conditions of service will be the same as if they were in the Civil Service.

This has led some hon. Members to see TUPE as something of a qualified blessing. It provides protection on the first day but offers no kind of guarantee thereafter. I do not think it should. That would be absurd. [Interruption.] I shall spell out in more detail precisely what we are doing. Hon. Members are either interested in these points or they are not. It would be absurd if the effect of the regulations were to continue to apply permanently to a new employer criteria deriving from his predecessor. All employers at some time wish to prepare and negotiate changes to terms and conditions. It is the essence of the Bill that it enables the dockyards to be managed outside the Civil Service in a commercial environment with the commercial manager accepting the full responsibility for managing the terms and conditions of his company.

It was pointed out in Committee that TUPE does not apply to pensions. We intend to set up pension schemes, one at each dockyard, for transferred employees to reproduce — hon. Members objected when my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Defence Procurement used the word "replicate"—as closely as possible the provisions of the principal Civil Service pension scheme. It is not possible—this was explained in Committee but was not fully taken on board—to reproduce the PCSPS in its entirety.

The PCSPS is statutorily based and certain payments can be made out of it which private sector schemes, set up as they are under trustees and governed by Inland Revenue regulations, cannot parallel. The right hon. Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies) accepted this with respect to redundancy payments, but it is not just a matter of redundancy payments. There are certain other types of provisions. For example, the way widows are treated is something that could not be mirrored in an Inland Revenue approved scheme. That is why we have used the words, both now and earlier on in Committee, "reproducing as fully as possisble".

Mr. Douglas rose——

Mr. Lamont: With regard to pensions, we intend to see that schemes are set up which embody the same calculations of retirement benefits, reckonable service and pensionable pay as the PCSPS. The scheme would allow, for the same index-linking and retirement age, all the same factors.

Shortly, we will be issuing a consultative document about pensions, which will set out the scheme that we envisage. It will describe the nature of the transfer scheme and the options open to civil servants transferring to the dockyards in regard to their accrued benefits. It will describe the actions that will have to be taken to set up the funds. The question of contributions will be discussed with the trade unions and contractors. The initial contribution rate is likely to be about 16 per cent. of the pensionable pay of the members of the schemes. We will obviously discuss this with the trade unions when we have issued the consultative documents.

Mr. Douglas: I am grateful to the Minister, and I apologise for interrupting him. These are very complicated matters. Am I correct in assuming that the employing company would, at all times, be the dockyard company? That is the company with which, at the end of the seven years, the Secretary of State or whoever would renegotiate terms of contracts. Why are the Government implying that there may be variations in TUPE over the period if the employing company is the permanent employer of the dockyard employees? Why should there be variations over a seven-year period or several seven-year periods?

Mr. Lamont: I am sorry — would the hon. Gentleman repeat his question on variations?

Mr. Douglas: I accept that these are complicated matters. If the employer of the dockyard employees is the dockyard company plc, that is a continuing entity. The contractors are not continuing entities. Why should there be provision for variations in either redundancy payments or pensions throughout the period? Why should there be differences for new entrants? Why can we not have consistency in relation to the TUPE regulations throughout the period?

Mr. Lamont: I think I have explained the philosophy. If a company is in the private sector, it would be inappropriate to embody in law something that is going on in perpetuity. It is as simple as that.

There will be a legal safeguard as regards TUPE. The hon. Member for Dunfermline, West (Mr. Douglas) is quite right in what he says about the distinction between new entrants and existing employees. That is not to say that people will automatically make a distinction between new entrants and existing employees, but it is something that, theoretically, could happen. That is the simple reason why we would not put in the Bill the sort of provision enshrined in the amendment.

The pension schemes will be funded schemes. The Government will pay a transfer payment in respect of the past service of those employees who elect to transfer their past service rights into the scheme. Thereafter, contributions will be made from employer and employees and the assets will be invested. The funds will have trustees who will be independent of the dockyard companies. They will be managed by a trustee body whose board will include persons nominated by the dockyard company, the commercial manager, the Government and the members of the scheme. Those trust funds will be a secure basis for the future of the pensions of the ex-civil servants employed by the dockyard companies.

Given all that, one could argue that the amendment is a worthwhile addition to the Bill. Placing a statutory guarantee over the pension arrangements would be a suitable reinforcement of the intentions inherent in setting up the schemes. But, as I have explained, such an argument would be misguided. The management of the funds will rest with the trustee boards, which will have the same responsibilities, such as investment, as any pensions trustee board in the private sector. Just as it is appropriate to ensure that the commercial manager has responsibility for the terms and conditions of service governed by the TUPE regulations, so it would be inappropriate to superimpose on the trustee boards a requirement in law to maintain benefits which permanently tie the schemes to the PCSPS and would be incompatible with the trust fund arrangements.

The Government are determined that the arrangements for the initial funding, benefits and management of the scheme will be secure, but the ongoing management of the scheme lies properly with the trustees. The object of the Bill is to enable the dockyard to be run in a commercial manner outside the Civil Service. In that sense, the amendment goes against the overall aim.

New clause 4 is not dissimilar in its intentions, in particular on the funding of redundancy compensation. Procedures for declaring and managing redundancies in the Ministry of Defence follow the overall Civil Service pattern and are set out in the Ministry's staff manual. They cover such matters as the order in which staff are made redundant, fields of redundancy, length of notice and so on. Again, under TUPE, those proceedings will transfer to the new employer with such changes as are necessary to reflect the fact that the dockyards will then be two separate and independent commercial companies rather than part of the Civil Service. But overall they will be largely unchanged and the new employer will operate those procedures until change is negotiated. Redundancy compensation in the Civil Service is calculated on a basis related to length of service and levels of pay. The benefits are set out as a chapter of the PCSPS rules.

I have previously referred to the Inland Revenue rules governing private sector pension schemes and to the factor, which the right hon. Member for Llanelli acknowledged, that the rules do not allow for redundancy compensation levels as set out to be paid out of pension funds. That means that compensation for any staff who are made redundant after vesting day will, in the new companies, have to be paid out of company funds. That is the point to which right hon. and hon. Members objected in Committee. It is the standard practice in the private sector. However, just as redundancy procedures will transfer to the new company, so will the need to provide levels of compensation as good as those in the Civil Service.

Here again, there are some areas where precise resolution will have to be discussed with the unions, the contractors and the Inland Revenue. But the overall intention will be to set up a scheme paying redundancy benefits either exactly the same or of equivalent value, and reckonable service accrued under the Crown will not be lost. An ex-civil servant made redundant by the dockyard company after vesting day will be paid compensation calculated on the total length of service with the company and with the Civil Service.

The right hon. Gentleman asked about redundancy having to be borne by the companies. I made the point that that was what normally happened in the private sector. As I am sure right hon. and hon. Members are aware, under the rules for winding up a company, a certain priority is given to redundancy payments. But if the astonishing happened and the contractor, who had been awarded the contract, went bankrupt, the Government would be taking over the assets and the labour force would transfer back. I think that that is an extremely unlikely contingency but that the answer I have given meets it.

Mr. Denzil Davies: I understand the Minister's point. The contingency may well be unlikely. However, our concern is not what happens if the company goes into liquidation but what happens if, after vesting day, the company declares redundancies. I think that the Minister has said that there will be negotiations to try to provide a level of redundancy payment more or less comparable to the present Civil Service scheme. We understand that, but we want to know where the money is to come from. There will be a company with one contract. In the case of pensions, the money will come in the end from the Ministry of Defence, by way of an extra charge. Will the money for future redundancies also be added to the bill and come, in effect, from the Ministry of Defence?

Mr. Lamont: The right hon. Gentleman has quickly summed up the situation. We have never disguised the fact that the cost of any redundancies, if there are any, will have to be funded by the contractor. Prior to vesting day, they would be paid for by the Government; after vesting day, by the company.

The right hon. Gentleman is moving on to a different point of concern. I have answered his previous point. He said in Committee that the real danger was that the company would not be able to meet——

Mr. Davies rose——

Mr. Lamont: I will answer the second point too. I am only pointing out that when I answer one point, the right hon. Gentleman dances round to another one. Both points are serious, and there are answers to both.

The right hon. Gentleman's original point was about the viability of the company. As regards the level of benefit after the transfer of the employees, TUPE applies, and the company will have to pay the same levels of redundancy benefit. It may subsequently negotiate with the trade unions again. However, many of the benefits — not necessarily the level of redundancy pay — have been negotiated. They are not all built into statute.

Mr. Davies: Let us suppose that, a year after vesting day, one of the two companies declares 1,000 people redundant, and that there has been no renegotiation of redundancy payments. The Minister says the TUPE applies and that the level of redundancy payments made to the 1,000 people will be more or less equal to what they would have received from the Civil Service pension scheme.

My question is simple. Where will the company find the money? The problem is the same as the problem of funding pensions. The company has nothing except a contract. Will that contract contain an extra increment to cover such an eventuality?

Mr. Lamont: I answered that point quite directly. The money comes out of the company's income—its cash flow. I repeated that a few moments ago. I admitted the logic of what the right hon. Gentleman had said. That has been taken account of in the costings. It is taken account of in the global figures that I gave on the first new clause.

I am trying to calm down some of the fears about lack of adequate benefit. Some of the comments made in Committee, which have not been repeated, I am glad to say, on the Floor of the House——

Mr. Hancock indicated assent.

Mr. Lamont: I see that the hon. Member for Portsmouth, South (Mr. Hancock) realises that what I say is realistic. The cost will fall on the company. That is entirely in line with the practice in industry. Any employer must assess the economic implications for the company of declaring staff redundant. So will the dockyard company. Companies bidding for the contract will have to estimate the need for, and cost of, any redundancy and include that in their business planning. They will have to meet those costs from their own income and funds. That income will come from the customers, as the right hon. Member for Llanelli pointed out.

The proposed new clause also seeks statutorily to impose the same levels of redundancy compensation on the company. The same amendments have been tabled to this clause as for that on pensions. For the reasons I have outlined, I cannot accept them, but I stress once again that the Government have been mindful of the interests of the employees in the dockyards. We are concerned to see dockyard companies set up which safeguard continuity of employment and employees' interests in respect of conditions of service, redundancies and pensions. I do not believe, despite what was said in Committee, that there is any real ground for anxiety. Therefore, I invite the House to reject the new clauses.

Mr. O'Neill: The Minister gave the game away in the last couple of minutes when he said that the income to meet the cost of redundancies will have to come from the customers. The customer in this case is the Ministry of Defence. At present, the money comes not from the Ministry of Defence but from the principal Civil Service pension scheme which, as I understand it, is funded by the Exchequer. Therefore, if the Government are telling us that they are making alternative arrangements for post-vesting day, we have to conclude that they have made some calculation of likely redundancy figures in the early years after vesting day. We know that those figures have been surmised and suggested. It is a measure of the Government's lack of confidence in the proposals that they are refusing to let us know those figures today.

It is clear that these two clauses are necessary, because we do not share the confidence of the Government that everything will eventually be all right. We do not share their view that there is some prospect that, after vesting day, the legislation which these two new clauses will provide in perpetuity will be to the disadvantage of the working people who are employed in the dockyards at present.

We have been told repeatedly that the Government do not want the hands of the new employers to be tied. We do not share that view if it means that the wages and conditions of the pension and redundancy arrangemens of the employees of the new organisations will be deleteriously affected by the process of privatisation. It is for those reasons that I call on my right hon. and hon. Friends to support the new clauses.

Tellers for the Noes:

Clause 1

TRANSFER OF PERSONS ENGAGED IN DOCKYARD SERVICES TRANSFERRED TO PRIVATE SECTOR

Mr. Lee: I beg to move amendment No. 2, in page 2, line 8, leave out
'the whole or any part of'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): With this it will be convenient to discuss Government amendments Nos. 3, 4 and 10.

Mr. Lee: The first three amendments have been tabled by the Government following the debates in Committee on clause 1(2)(b) and remove any doubt that the dockyards might be split into different parts. Amendments Nos. 2 and 4 make it clear that only one company will be set up by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence for each dockyard. Amendment No. 3 does no more than tidy up the clause to remove any doubt which might otherwise have been caused over the transfer of dockyard employees. Amendment No. 10 brings clause 1(8) into line with clause 1(4), thus meeting the concerns expressed in Committee by the right hon. Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies).

As the House knows, the vast majority of those employed in the dockyards will transfer to the dockyard company, but not all will so transfer. Therefore, I invite the House to agree to amendments Nos. 2, 3, 4 and 10.

Mr. Denzil Davies: As the Under-Secretary of State has said, these amendments reflect the debates in Committee. We are grateful to him for responding to the points that we made. We have no objection to any of the amendments.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendments made: No. 3 in page 2, line 9, after 'undertaking', insert
'(disregarding their services for this purpose)'.

No. 4, in page 2, line 10, leave out 'any of the'.—[Mr. Lee.]

Mr. Lamont: I beg to move amendment No. 5, in page 2, line 22, leave out 'transfer of the'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take the following: Government amendments Nos. 6, 7 and 9.

Amendment No. 8, in page 2, line 24, after second 'a', insert 'commercial'.

Mr. Lamont: All these amendments are concerned with TUPE, which we discussed earlier and on various aspects of which we had a debate in Standing Committee.

The right hon. Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies) said that TUPE had good parts and was probably a beneficial addition to our law relating to the transfer of undertakings. The right hon. Gentleman conceded that the regulations protect many rights which perhaps were not protected before. The purpose of one of his amendments was to ensure that TUPE applies not just to the present transfer but to a transfer to any future management. The Government and the Opposition are as one in wanting to ensure that TUPE applies.

In Committee the right hon. Gentleman said that he was broadly satisfied with what we proposed, with one exception, which was that in his view, unless the Bill made it clear that the dockyard undertaking was to be treated as a commercial business, TUPE could not be guaranteed to apply. I undertook to consider further whether an amendment along the lines that he was suggesting was necessary. I have since written to the right hon. Gentleman confirming that in my view such an amendment is not required to ensure, as we both want, that there is no doubt that TUPE applies in this case. The legal advice that I have been given—we have gone into this matter in some detail — is that the dockyard undertaking at each dockyard is an undertaking within the 1981 regulations.

The right hon. Gentleman knows that I was satisfied that the Bill was therefore sound in this respect. None the less, further consideration has been given by the draftsmen to the wording of clause 1(4). I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will accept that amendments 5 to 9 are directed towards the result that we all want. Clause 1(4) remains directed towards the application of TUPE to the transfer of the employees alone.

As we have said before, there was a legal doubt, although not the legal doubt which the right hon. Gentleman raised. I give this explanation because I think that the right hon. Gentleman and his hon. Friends might otherwise think that I am introducing this amendment because of the point which the right hon. Gentleman made. It is, in fact, a different point, despite the wording of the amendment. There was a legal doubt whether the transfer of the employees alone, without more, would be an undertaking within the meaning of TUPE. With the amendments which we are debating now, the subsection removes any doubt, by providing that the services of the employees, without more, shall be treated as part of the undertaking capable of being transferred as a business. As a result, I think it is beyond doubt that TUPE will apply to the transfer of the services to a company formed by my right hon. Friend.

Clause 1(4) in the Bill as printed was sound, but the approach which I have just described avoids any argument and I hope that the House will agree that it makes clear beyond any doubt the application of TUPE. For this reason, I hope that hon. Gentlemen will not press their amendment but will support what we have proposed.

Mr. Denzil Davies: The Minister of State has explained why these amendments have been brought forward. We shall certainly not claim any false victory and I accept entirely that it is through his hard work and that of his officials that these amendments have been brought forward. TUPE does not seem to be too easy for anybody, as far as I can see.

With regard to the points we raised in Committee about the commercial operation of the dockyards, I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his letter. His lawyers have managed to find a case, although I do not think it is as good as the case that I found, and I accept that the dockyards, although they are not a commercial venture, are perhaps in the nature of a commercial venture. I am sure that there is a lot of room for debate even there, but, since TUPE is a good thing, we want to see it applied. We shall not be pressing the objections which we pressed in the Standing Committee, and we welcome the amendments that have been made.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendments made: No. 6, in page 2, line 23 leave out 'the transfer of'.

No. 7, in page 2, line 24 after 'undertaking', insert 'capable of being transferred'.

No. 9, in page 2 line 26 leave out 'any'.

No. 10, in page 3, line 16 after second 'of', insert 'any of'.—[Mr. Norman Lamont.]

Clause 3

Expenses of Secretary of State

Mr. Denzil Davies: I beg to move amendment No. 11, in page 3, line 44 leave out 'or operation'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take the following amendments: No. 12, in page 4, line 2 after 'dockyard', insert

'or the operation of any such company wholly owned and controlled by the Secretary of State'.

Amendment (a) to amendment No. 12, in line 2, leave out 'and controlled'.

Mr. Davies: The object of the amendment is to make clear, which the Bill does not, the expenses incurred in the formation and operation of any company—the crucial word is "operation".

As the Bill is drafted, the Secretary of State could come to the House and assort money for the operation of any company to run the dockyards. In other words, if A and P Appledore International could not do so, under clause 3 the Secretary of State could get money from taxpayers to do so. That might or might not be a good thing, but I do not believe that it was intended. It would have extraordinary effects. The Under-Secretary of State said that that was not intended, and we have tabled the amendments to put the Government's intention in words.

I see from the Government amendment to our amendment No. 12 that there is not the word "resist". At last the Under-Secretary of State and the Minister have got their way, and have been allowed to accept one of our amendments. The Minister shakes his head, and perhaps that remark was premature, but I think that on this occasion we can claim a small victory.

Mr. Lee: As the right hon. Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies) said, clause 3*(a), among other things, allows my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to pay out of money voted by Parliament expenses incurred in operating any company formed by my right hon. Friend at either of the dockyards. When that was raised in Committee, I said that that provision in clause 3(a)* would allow my right hon. Friend to incur expenses in the event of his operating the dockyards as a Government-owned public limited company.

The right hon. Gentleman said that the clause does not refer specifically to a Government-owned plc. He is quite right; it does not. But if one looks at the rest of the subsection it is, I believe, clear enough what is intended. The clause refers to expenses of my right hon. Friend incurred in connection with the operation of any company formed with a view to the provision of dockyard services at a designated dockyard. What expenses would my right hon. Friend incur, if the company were not being operated by a Government-owned plc?

I accept, however, that amendments on the lines of those suggested by the right hon. Gentleman would make explicit what I believe is already implicit. Therefore, I would not wish to oppose the right hon. Gentleman's amendment to remove the words "or operation" in page 3, line 44. So it is victory. Obviously, however, as the right hon. Gentleman's further amendment implies, if the words "or operation" are to be removed, they would have to be replaced by others to ensure that my right hon. Friend could operate a government-owned plc at each dockyard if he wished.

I hope that we can leave Report stage on a note of agreement. I cannot, however, agree the wording of the right hon. Gentleman's second amendment to this subsection in its present form. If the words are included, no purpose would be served by including the words "controlled by". I have therefore proposed an amendment to the right hon. Gentleman's amendment which is as he has proposed, but without the tautology.

"wholly owned by the Secretary of State"

I could not accept the right hon. Gentleman's amendment to leave out the words "or operation" without a substitute. I would not, however, oppose it, if the amendment I have proposed were acceptable to the right hon. Gentleman and his hon. Friends.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment made: No. 12, as amended, in page 4, line 2, after 'dockyard', insert

'or the operation of any such company wholly owned by the Secretary of State'.—[Mr. Denzil Davies.]

Mr. Norman Lamont: I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

We have had a long line of reports on the past performance of the dockyards, and the shortcomings and problems have been extremely well documented. Nobody could do other than agree, and I think that the right hon. Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies) accepts this, that change is greatly needed in the dockyards. Right hon. and hon. Members may not agree with the particular method we have chosen, but the case for some change is extremely strong, given the record of the dockyards. We would certainly not have put forward this scheme unless we were strongly convinced that substantial improvements in performance and savings to the Exchequer could be achieved.

During the debate on new clause 1, I attempted to indicate some of the calculations behind the overall calculation that we have made of savings of £21 million in the first 10 years and of a higher amount after the initial costs have been amortised. Ever since I have been connected with this Bill I have always emphasised that these costs are, in a sense, illustrative. They are based on certain assumptions. The efficiency savings assumed could be even greater.

I repeat the point I made when we were discussing new clause 1. Many of the costs that people have been so anxious to analyse and investigate in these debates would have to be incurred in any genuine attempt to improve the performance of the dockyards. I refer to proposals such as setting up new management accounting systems. It is a terrible comment on the state of the dockyards that it should actually be necessary to go to such lengths to install proper management control and accounting systems. If Opposition Members were genuine in saying that they wanted to improve the efficiency of the dockyards, they would admit that costs such as te cost of having consultants advising on those systems and the cost of hardware and software would have to be incurred.

The hon. Member for Clackmannan (Mr. O'Neill) said that I did say what would be the cost of setting up a trading fund. That question cannot be answered, because the answer depends precisely on what level of efficiency it was assumed a trading fund would achieve. The cost of buying out restrictive practices is the same either under a trading fund or under commercial management, but there is a crucial difference. Under the trading fund there is not a separation of the customer and the supplier. That is really one of the key reasons why we have gone for the introduction of this method of commercial management rather than simply setting up a trading fund whereby, because the customer and supplier are so closely related, it is possible for the supplier merely to price himself into profit.

Part of the debate that we had in Committee and again today has been about the effect on the work force and what would happen in the cases of pensions and entitlements to redundancy benefits and other negotiated benefits. I believe I managed to demonstrate to the House that there is no reason to think that people would be worse off; there is a considerable safety net. One cannot guarantee security for people for ever in any world, and certainly when people have moved into the private sector there are changes. Naturally, big changes will be brought about, but there will be a core programme. Obviously, we believe that there will be continuing work for the dockyards.

Particularly as regards Rosyth, I am amazed at what Labour Members are prepared to say about the effects of commercial management, when we contemplate even for a moment their proposal to get rid of our independent deterrent, because getting rid of Trident would remove 40 per cent. of the work load at Rosyth. It is absurd for right hon. and hon. Gentlemen to spread scare stories about the cost of redundancy when what they propose in relation to the independent deterrent would leave a gaping hole in the work load at Rosyth. I wish to refer to letters written by the Leader of the Opposition to workers at Devonport and Rosyth. They show the utmost cynicism. The letters were identical except that three sentences in the letter to Devonport workers referred to the need to get rid of Trident and there were no references to Trident in the letter to Rosyth workers. The second paragraph in the Devonport letter states:

> "You know of the plans to cut the workforce by 400 by next April. Behind that comes the threat to a further 4,000 jobs under the proposals of the 'Levine Report' which, fostered by Michael Heseltine, prepares the way for the privatisation of the Royal Dockyard as a 'managing agency'. At the same time, the Government is locked into the Trident programme which will swallow at least £12 billion of defence expenditure and strip the rest of British defence provision."

> "You know of the plans to cut the workforce by 400 next April."

and so on, except that the sentences about Trident are omitted. I shall gladly give way to any Labour Member who will tell me why those sentences are left out. Labour Members always want to intervene during my speeches, but they do not want to do so this time. What possible reason, other than the greatest cynicism, can they have? They know that their proposals will have a devastating effect on Rosyth. The number of jobs at risk under our proposals are as nothing compared with the effect of the Labour party's defence policy.

Mr. Gordon Brown: Nonsense.

Mr. Lamont: It is not. It is the absolute truth, as the hon. Gentleman well knows. I make no apology for mentioning those letters, because they should be on the record. They were cynical letters.

By introducing commercial management into the dockyards we seek to achieve full value for money from the defence budget, a climate of maximum competition, freedom for local management from public sector constraints, enabling them to operate effectively in a competitive environment, better levels of efficiency, a clear separation between the dockyards as suppliers and the Navy as customer, financial and accounting arrangements which reflect normal commercial practice and scope for commercial management to expand employment opportunities in the regions concerned by bidding for some of the commercial work available as well.

Mr. O'Neill: Argentina.

Mr. Lamont: Even the hon. Gentleman might think occasionally that it is a long way to come from Argentina for a ship refit. I do not think that that is likely.

Mr. O'Neill: Touche Ross referred to it.

Mr. Lamont: Touche Ross listed all the navies in the world. If the hon. Gentleman cannot do better than that, he should go away and do a little more studying.

There are good, sound reasons why commercial management must be introduced if we are willing to face up to the problems which Governments have so often identified in the dockyards. The difference is that no one has been prepared to do anything about those problems. That is why we have the Bill. I am confident that it will give better value for money and a better service to the Royal Navy.

Mr. Denzil Davies: The Minister made a knockabout speech, and we understand why. He knows that he has a weak case. It was clear in Committee that his heart was not in the legislation. He had to come back to it, jetlagged from the Khyber pass, or wherever he had been, and was thrown straight into Second Reading. There were many problems in the background when the Bill was in Committee, including the famous Lygo letter and the difficulties at the Department of Trade and Industry, from which the hon. Gentleman had just come. He found it difficult to concentrate in Committee on this little Bill. He had played no part in its preparation—not that that was his fault.

The Minister knows very well that the Bill does not make any sense and that it is part of the frenetic ideology of the former Secretary of State for Defence, the right hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine). Were it not for the right hon. Member for Henley, I do not think that we would have had this Bill tonight.

The Bill was ill-thought-out and ill-considered. None of the options were considered, and certainly none were costed. This scheme was not costed, and that was clear from our debates in Committee.

The Minister discussed unemployment in Scotland, but under his Government unemployment in Scotland has trebled. Given the Government's record, I do not think that the Minister should say anything about unemployment in Scotland.

The Bill is neither one thing nor the other. It is not privatisation, and it is not public sector. It is an extremely hybrid scheme and it has no basis. I do not think that any other country, including the United States of America, operates, or would operate, its dockyards in the way that the Government propose for Rosyth and Devonport.

The Minister spoke of the great difficulty of introducing other schemes, but there would be no difficulty in doing so. It is possible to run the dockyards under a trading fund. The royal ordnance factories were run very successfully under such a fund. The Minister was extremely insulting when he kept on referring to the ordnance factories as pricing themselves into profit. That was not the case. The ordnance factories operated commercially and profitably. The problems have arisen after privatisation. The ordnance factories are now being run down and are facing redundancies. Their future is insecure. I do not wish to spread alarm, but, frankly, if this proposal goes through I can see the same thing happening to the dockyards.

The ordnance factories operated well under a trading fund. We hear that we had to buy all those computers and all that hardware and software. I counted the number of times that the Minister mentioned hardware and software. He talked about enough hardware and software to sink an aircraft carrier. Apparently all the costs would go on hardware and software—how ridiculous.

The Minister has still not answered the question about costs. He said that according to the Government's figures —pretty ropy figures—£21 million a year over 10 years would accrue to the Exchequer. I asked what the deficit would be to the budget of the Ministry of Defence, but he was afraid, properly from his point of view, to answer.

The deficit, a coincidental figure, will be £21 million a year. The Minister knows that, because it is in the documents. That deficit has gone up since the original calculations in June 1985. The deficit will be £21 million, and multiplied by 10 that is over £200 million deficit to the Ministry of Defence's budget. The Minister knows that, and he should have answered the question.

That deficit comes partly from having to pay £11 million a year for this new organisation. Another 800 new staff will be taken on—that is what the efficiency is about. The staffing level will rise by 800. Other functions and other co-ordinations will have to be carried out. Secretaries will have to be employed, and they in turn will require secretaries. We know what will happen—the bureaucracy will increase. A further 800 new staff are to be employed while 2,500 dockyard workers at Rosyth and Devonport are apparently to be sacked. Is that the sort of efficiency that we can expect from this commercial management?

The Ministry of Defence will also have to pay the pensions, which means another £9 million a year. Altogether, it adds up to £20 million a year out of the Ministry's budget. On top of that, if there are redundancies the cost will be charged to the Ministry. When we discussed new clause 3, the Minister admitted that the only way to replicate the redundancy payments under the Civil Service pension scheme if the contractor did not have the money to make the payments would be to put the cost of such payments on the price of the article and the customer would pay, as the customer always does.

That again will come out of the Ministry of Defence's budget, so the figure of £200 million that I mentioned earlier is a conservative estimate. The Minister of State shakes his head. All he can say is that the Treasury will somehow or other look at the matter, think about it and take it into account. I am sure that he does not believe that the Treasury will hand over £200 million to the Ministry of Defence to pay for the scheme. The money will come from the Ministry of Defence's budget, and the Minister knows that well.

The Bill may be given its Third Reading, although the Government's majority has been going down and down. Perhaps we should have put down a few more amendments. Last time they had a majority of 34 or 35. I can understand why the Minister of State galloped through his speech. He is having difficulty keeping his troops here. The Minister of State, Department of Trade and Industry, has apparently gone abroad rather than vote for this legislation. Nobody believes that the Bill will improve efficiency in the dockyards or that costs will be saved. As I said earlier, the Royal Navy will receive an inferior service, and it will do so at a higher cost. That will be the effect of what the Government are doing.

Even if the Bill receives its Third Reading this evening, may I suggest, gently and kindly, to the Minister that he should put the Bill to one side, forget about it and leave it where it should have been left before the right hon.

[Mr. Denzil Davies]

Member for Henley tried to introduce it. It will be damaging to the Government, to the dockyard workers and to Britain's defence.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Miss Janet Fookes.

Hon. Members: Oh!

Miss Janet Fookes (Plymouth, Drake): I hear noises from Labour Members, but I hope that I am entitled to speak, particularly on Third Reading.

I want to put two points to my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary. First, I want from him assurances about the terms and conditions of the employees. I am well aware that that has been discussed at length in Committee, but it is appropriate that on Third Reading the assurance should be given that, so far as possible, the terms and conditions for employees should be no less good than before. Indeed, I am rather more optimistic than Labour Members because I hope that in the fullness of time they will be better. We should now look on this as an opportunity for things to be made better rather than simply assuming, as Labour Members seem to assume, that they will be made worse. It is obviously of importance to individual employees that they have those assurances. I know that many rumours have abounded in the city quite understandably in the period of uncertainty and transition, and it would be helpful to have that assurance tonight.

Looking now at the rather broader issue of commercial management, my hon. Friends on the Front Bench will know my reservations about that. When the management put in its bid I was greatly encouraged because I genuinely believe that that represents the best way forward and the other assurance that I would like from my hon. Friends tonight is that they will be looking at the management's bid seriously. Clearly, I do not expect it to be successful regardless of the management's capacity to perform. It must operate in fair competition with any other company. I believe that only one consortium is in competition. But it is of the greatest importance to me that that assurance should be given. I have the highest regard for the management at the dockyard, particularly for the managing director. If anyone can make a success of this for the employees, the dockyard and the city it is Mr. David Johnston. I have backed his bid strongly right from the beginning—from the time when I first knew about it. However, I do not want window-dressing. I need to know that the Government are serious about the bid. I believe that if the management team can win the competition for the commercial management it will be a very good thing for the city and the employees — especially as I understand that the management would wish to buy locally many of the supplies that now have to come from other parts of the country. That would be very good for the economy of the city.

I hope, too, that the new company will be able to find opportunities to take on other work not related to the Royal Navy. I recall that that was one of the original objectives of the major change that is to be made. I hope very much that it will come to fruition, because it must be for the good of the dockyard and the city if other work can be found apart from the immediate Royal Navy work. The amount of that work has always fluctuated. I remember a newspaper report some 20 years ago making dire predictions of a downturn in the amount of work provided by the Royal Navy for the dockyard. If those fluctuations can be evened out by other work not related to the Royal Navy, that will be to the good of the dockyard.

Mr. Douglas: Such as?

Miss Fookes: I do not pretend to be an expert on what might be done in that dockyard. I believe that there is an enormous residue of skilled labour there because generations of Plymouthians have gone into the dockyard. I do not believe that it is beyond the wit of man—or, specifically, of Mr. Johnston — to find other opportunities for all the skills there. I would not pretend to teach Mr. Johnston his business, but I believe that those opportunities exist.

I conclude with those two points, and ask for those assurances.

10.47 pm

Dr. Owen: Listening to the hon. Member for Plymouth, Drake (Miss Fookes), I am reminded of T. S. Eliot's line:

"Not with a bang but a whimper."

There was a moment when the hon. Lady joined us in opposing the Bill on a cross-party basis. If this is the end of her opposition, she would have done much better never to start it. Whatever one's view on the hon. Member for Plymouth, Sutton (Mr. Clark) and whether or not he should resign from the Government, at least his views on the Bill are so perfectly clear that he has sought neither to be here nor to vote on it. With such support, I certainly think that the city of Plymouth has a right to draw some attention to what has been happening.

I must say that I am angry tonight. This is a bad Bill. It is very bad for the city of Plymouth. It is a poor way of repaying years of loyalty to successive Governments by the people who work in the dockyard. Furthermore, it is my fear and belief that the service to the Royal Navy will be damaged, and that thereby the Navy will be damaged too.

I have no doubt, too, from our earlier discussions on the costs, that all this will be achieved at a heavy price. It is time that hon. Gentlemen on the Government Benches, and the hon. Lady, realised that the defence budget is now being cut by 7 per cent. in real terms over the next three years. The additional extra cost which no one has denied will fall on the dockyard over the next few years will damage the defence of this country.

There is little to be gained by going over old arguments. The Government have got what they wanted, on paper. They will get the Bill. They have been able to take out of the Government service a very large number of people. On paper, the Civil Service will be much reduced. That the Government have achieved. In the process, they have also declared substantial redundancies. Most of the redundancies have been voluntary, and I am pleased about that, but 2,000 jobs have been lost in Plymouth and in my view more will be lost over the next decade. I believe that eventually the dockyard will employ about 7,000 people.

I face the fact that the Government have the power, but I ask them not to use it. There is no doubt that there is a massive body of opinion, much of it in the Tory party, a substantial number of industrialists and an increasing number of people in the Navy who are waking up to what is really happening to them. They say to the Government "Create Devonport plc, but do not fragment the dockyard". It is nonsensical to cut into the dockyard in the way that has been done, separating the management from the control of the assets. We have heard today and seen in the report what substantial assets there are. If anything can be salvaged out of this mess let it be a rolls royce solution in that the Government have a commercial company. The employees are no longer civil servants, but at least let them all be employed and operate one single industrial enterprise which would be Devonport dockyard and Rosyth dockyard. It is not what we wanted and it is not ideal but if the Secretary of State were to go to the unions and say that he would be prepared to not implement the Bill he would find that there would be a response and, even at this late stage, I hope that the Secretary of State will look at that.

On the matter of employment prospects at Rosyth, I want to make it clear that although we have opposed this Bill with the Labour party we do not hold its view on what should happen to Polaris. We would not decommission Polaris. It would continue for its natural life. Even though we would cancel Trident, I believe that it would be possible, by expanding the SSN build rate, to pick up the slack and retain a substantial dockyard and submarine refitting at Rosyth. I do not believe that the cancellation of Trident, provided it was with the continuation of Polaris to the end of its natural life—which is certainly until 1997—need harm Rosyth dockyard. It also need not harm employment at Vickers because we would be increasing the submarine build rate to take up a good deal of the slack.

That having been said, the substantive issue is the Bill. The Bill deserves to be rejected. My hon. Friend the Member for Portsmouth, South (Mr. Hancock), who was on the Committee for the Social Democratic party and the alliance, and I will vote against this as will many of my right hon. and hon. Friends. We shall do so because we think that it is a damaging Bill. It is bad for the Navy and bad for employment. It is a relic of the right hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine) that should be dispatched to the wastepaper basket. If the present Secretary of State had any sense he would have nothing to do with the Bill.

Mr. Henry Bellingham (Norfolk, North-West): I am aware of the fact that I do not have any expert knowledge on this matter and I do not have a constituency interest. However, I was on the Standing Committee along with other right hon. and hon. Members. The right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen) mentioned that his hon. Friend the Member for Portsmouth, South (Mr. Hancock) was on the Committee. He came and went; as I remember, he did a runner and did not come back, or at least I cannot remember his coming back. However, I understand that he then issued press releases, took on the Government single-handed and did a great deal of good in getting them to change their mind. However, I do recall the hon. Gentleman doing a runner.

One of the characteristics of the Committee was the number of contributions from different hon. Members. It was a good-natured Committee. The Bill has met widespread opposition from many quarters, but it is easy to forget the background. Many local industry groups, local Members of Parliament, trade unions, the City and local authorities agree that change is vital for the long-term future of the dockyards.

The past 15 years have seen many reports, reviews and studies on the performance of the dockyards and many of them make extremely grim reading. Until now, no Government have dared to grip the situation. In 1978 there was a report and the then Labour Government had the opportunity to introduce a trading fund but they ran away from that. They had an ideal opportunity, but nothing was done. I do not feel that doing nothing in this case was a viable option. That is why I congratulate the Government on having the courage to make a brave attempt to tackle head on a situation that was becoming extremely serious.

I have a number of reservations on that matter, as have other Conservative Members, and my preference was for a trading fund. However, I am a realist and it would be churlish of me not to support the Government tonight, as they are making an attempt to do something positive and constructive.

I hope that the Minister will clarify two points which are causing me concern. The first relates to costs. The right hon. Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies) raised three points which relate to additional costs which will arise as a result of the Bill, but other costs were mentioned in a series of press articles towards the end of last week and I should be grateful if the Minister would comment on them.

The first point relates to the estimated £30 million consultancy fees and to an unquantified cost in Ministry of Defence staff time. There is also the sum of £46 million to ensure the continuation of a supply service to the Ministry of Defence and the matter of VAT which will now have to be paid on dockyard contracts. Another point which the right hon. Member might have mentioned was the fact that the dockyards will be supplied by the Ministry of Defence with a management financial ledger—an accounting package for the use of contractors—and that will lead to an additional cost.

It is surprising that detailed figures have not been given. There is an urgent need for those additional figures and I urge the Minister, if he cannot give them tonight, to provide them in the very near future.

The final point which concerns me is that the Comptroller and Auditor General will no longer have access to the books of the dockyard operators. Therefore, there will not be, as I understand it—I may be wrong and I hope that the Minister can clarify this for me—any accountability to Parliament once the Bill reaches the Statute Book.

I am worried about those points, but I congratulate the Government on tackling this matter, on biting the bullet and on coming forward with a positive and constructive Bill. I wish the Bill every success and I am pleased that I had the chance of serving on the Standing Committee.

Mr. Gordon Brown: This is a bad Bill, which no amount of amending could have improved. It is very interesting to note that the main argument from the Conservative Back Benchers who have spoken in favour of the Bill tonight is that they have no expertise in the matter of dockyards. They would have done better to adopt the course taken by the hon. Member for Plymouth, Sutton (Mr. Clark), who, knowing that he could not succeed in the amendments that he wanted and that he could not get the guarantees he sought about removing the possibility of foreign control, absented himself from the House and said that, if he had been here, he would have had the guts at least to have voted against the Bill.

[Mr. Gordon Brown]

There are no guarantees in this very short Bill about apprenticeships, conditions of service or preventing foreign control. We have seen in the documents issued today that the possibility of a foreign state holding in the dockyards is being contemplated. There are no guarantees about security and, in the documents, the Ministry of Defence contemplates that the Ministry of Defence police may pass into private hands within a year of the privatisation exercise. There are no guarantees in the Bill about those matters.

The Ministry of Defence civil servant leading the operation was right to tell the Public Accounts Committee and the Select Committee on Defence that the Bill is the high-risk option for the future of the Navy and for the efficiency of the fleet. When risks are involved in the dependability of the service to the Navy, in the reliability of that service and the capability of the dockyards to respond in times of emergency, the only certainty about the Bill is that it will cost the defence budget more.

Nothing that the Minister has said so far today alters the Opposition's view that, in the first years, in the first decade and indeed until the end of this century, the Bill will cost the taxpayer more. At the same time jobs will be lost both at Devonport and at Rosyth. It ill befits the Minister of State to talk about Labour's policies when his Government have been responsible for closing Chatham, for the reorganisation of Portsmouth and in the last year for a cut of 2,000 jobs at Devonport and 400 jobs at Rosyth.

That is not the end of the matter. In the documents which we should have had days ago but which have only been made available to us today, it is made clear to the contractor that the Government expect substantial job cuts at both Rosyth and Devonport as a result of privatisation. Indeed, the contractors are asked "to list the scope for cost effective subcontracting and how this could affect the size of the work force and facilities."

They are also asked

"to state their intentions for taking work out of the dockyard"— not bringing work in—

"for completion in other parts of their organisation or through subcontracting".

Mr. Norman Lamont: The hon. Gentleman made that point in Committee and alleged that we never answered it. It is true that contractors were asked whether they would take work out. I am sure the hon. Gentleman will agree with me that it is a good thing that we should know whether they intend to do that. He will know too that the document also asked whether they would bring work in. If the hon. Gentleman quotes one, he should quote the other. We want to know what will happen. The hon. Gentleman is totally misrepresenting the position, not for the first time.

Mr. Brown: The Minister is right to say that the document asks what work will be taken out and what work will be brought in. Of course, the assumption behind the whole manoeuvre and behind the costings, which have not been properly brought to the House, is that jobs will be lost as a result of the scheme. [Interruption.] I shall give one illustration of that in the document that was issued today. It says that contractors

"should also indicate how they would minimise the impact on the local community of any future reductions in the dockyard work force."

If that is not the Ministry of Defence expecting job reductions as a result of the scheme, I do not know what evidence the hon. Member for Plymouth, Drake (Miss Fookes) needs.

It is all confirmed in the report to the Public Accounts Committee by the Ministry of Defence last summer, when the Ministry of Defence specifically asked that the figures that it had given about the possibile redundancies resulting from the privatisation scheme should be kept secret by being marked "confidential" and therefore denied to hon. Members and to the public.

The Bill's proposals have found no favour with any organisation or committee that has examined the future of the dockyards since the war. They have been rejected as options by them all. The proposals have been resisted unanimously by every section of the work force in Devonport and Rosyth; they have caused anger among the work force, because this is a change not by consent but by the unilateral imposition of the Minister's own ideas.

The proposals threaten jobs, risk the efficiency of the Navy, risk the dependability of the service to the Navy and involve additional costs. Indeed, now that we have debated them for 70 hours in Committee and for five or six hours today, it is obvious that the proposals are just privatisation for the sake of privatisation. No shares will be issued, so there is no mass capitalism. No savings will come to the public sector borrowing requirement, because the Government will still have to fund all new investment. The Minister has satisfied neither us nor any of the Committees of the House that have examined the matter that savings will come on day-to-day costs. The Minister would do better to drop the proposals by refusing to implement the Bill if it ever gets through both Houses.

Mr. Hancock: We have had a long debate today and we spent many hours on the Bill in Committee. The hon. Member for Norfolk, North-West (Mr. Bellingham) made an intervention to criticise my performance in Committee. That was a bit rich, when his only two contributions in Committee were, first, to inquire whether or not we should leave the room when the fire alarm went off, and secondly, to congratulate the Minister of State on his considerable leadership and charisma on the issue. Having missed the Report stage, he should not have come in on Third Reading to try to score a cheap point.

We have today explained as best we can that the only winners tonight will be the Government, but that there will be many losers in the future because of the Bill's effect on the Navy, on dockyard workers and on the country's defence.

You have been in the Chair for a substantial part of the debate, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and I am sure that you cannot have failed to accept the valid arguments that have been raised time and again about the problems that the Bill will create. The sadness that fills my heart arises from the fact that I have seen the dockyard in Portsmouth being run down. In my lifetime, the work force has fallen from 30,000 to about 5,000 now in the Navy base. I have seen what such devastation can do to a city, and I have nothing but fears for Rosyth and Devonport. I am sorry that I do not have the enthusiasm of the hon. Member for Plymouth, Drake (Miss Fookes). I do not see the opportunities, but only the enormous problems that the Bill will create for the nation and those who have worked loyally on our behalf.

Many hon. Members have offered Ministers suggestions about what they should do after the Bill receives a Third Reading. Some have suggested that Ministers should sit on the Bill, others have suggested that it be put in the dustbin. Ministers should take a tip from those who have examined the Bill carefully. They should take the advice that my right hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen) and Labour Members have offered. They should not try to enact the Bill. They should not inflict such damage on people who have been loyal or risk damaging the effective and efficient operation of the Navy. The Bill is a mistake, and although the Government may win tonight, the nation will lose in the long run.

Mr. Douglas: It is interesting to reflect on the country's response to legislation as it passes through Parliament. When, for example, in the Defence Select Committee and in discussions with responsible local authorities in Fife and elsewhere, we first examined the Government's proposals, the Government claimed that this was a good and necessary measure. They told us that everyone agreed that change was necessary.

One would therefore expect that, since the Bill was published, there would have been a great wave of public support and acclaim for this great new measure designed to improve efficiency and to ensure that the Royal Navy got not the service to which it has been used, but an improved one.

After 70 hours in Committee and on Report, we have heard from only two Conservative Back Benchers. That is a measure of the number of friends that the Bill has acquired in the House and the country. With such friends, the Bill does not need enemies, one might argue. The Government have manifestly failed to enthuse dockyard workers, the Navy or the areas concerned. The more the Bill has been explained and exposed, the more support for it, even from Conservative Back Benchers, has diminished.

The hon. Member for Plymouth, Drake (Miss Fookes), in an engaging revelation, told us that she is not an expert. All the experts who have examined this proposal damn it. It is damned by the Navy, by the locality, by the Select Committee on Defence, upon which the Government have a majority, and by the Public Accounts Committee. The only way in which to get approval for this nasty, paltry little measure is to impose a three-line Whip and drive the Government's majority through the Lobby.

This Bill has no friends. The Minister said that this expenditure will be needed anyway. If it is so essential to set up an organisation in Bath to monitor future project management day by day, why not do it now? If this is a device to make the dockyards more efficient, why not do it now without the Bill? What is the difficulty about employing Peat Marwick Mitchell and Co. or Touche Ross and Co. to examine the dockyards' accountancy system without the passage of this stupid, paltry little measure?

The hon. Member for Drake said that she supports the managing director over the management buy-out of the Plymouth dockyard, but she said not a word about the possibility of a conflict of interest. Is there no conflict of interest for serving naval officers and men who are engaged on the refitting and repair of naval vessels in working hand in hand with private enterprise groups with which they will have to consort to achieve the Government's aims in this Bill? Does not that disturb right hon. and hon. Members on the Government Benches? This is a devilish and stupid little measure that does not provide for efficiency in the fleet. I have sought overwhelmingly to prove that it will be costly both to the Exchequer and to the budget of the Ministry of Defence.

The Minister of State for Defence Procurement referred to the damage which he said Labour party policy would cause to employment in Rosyth. I am willing to go to Rosyth and Dunfermline this weekend and debate the Government's policy for Rosyth compared with the Labour party's policy. I make that open challenge to the Minister. I take the view about patriotism that was expressed the other week by the right hon. and learned Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Brittan). Who are the patriots now? We are witnessing the ending of 500 or 600 years of history. For 500 or 600 years the dockyards have been in the public domain. They have served the navy and the national interest. They have served not just Rosyth, Devonport and Plymouth but the national interest as a whole.

The patriots on the Conservative Benches are putting aside the interests of the nation because of their view about what private enterprise should do. I feel that I speak for the whole of the Labour party when I say that we give notice to contractors that if they spend valuable managerial time going through the proliferation of documents that have been issued today, it will have been wasted. The Labour party believes that the Navy is in the public domain and that therefore the dockyards should also be in the public domain. When Labour is returned to power it will bring back the dockyards into the public domain.

Mr. O'Neill: It is two years since Mr. Levene visited Rosyth. He spent two hours there and produced the recommendations which have borne fruit in this Bill. The only thing upon which hon. Members on both sides of the House agree is that the status quo is not an option. No hon. Member can be happy with the prevailing conditions at Rosyth, but the Opposition object to the manner in which the initial investigations were conducted. We object to the so-called consideration of the options and the farce of the consultation process. We now object to the implementation of the preferred option. We disagree with the assumptions on the costs and benefits. We disagree with the impact of the new contracts on industrial relations. We have received no assurances tonight that wages, conditions, redundancy arrangements and pensions will be copper-bottomed or guaranteed by the Government or by the legislation. We expect that the redundancies that will ensue after vesting day will be met with bitterness and industrial strife, which will render all the Government's ambitions to improve the efficiency of the yards as naught.

The Opposition disagree with and disapprove of the arrangement in its entirety. It will be bad for those who work in the yards and for the communities surrounding them. It may be acceptable to the hon. Member for Plymouth, Drake (Miss Fookes) that 2,000 jobs should go in Devonport through voluntary redundancy. What about the lost opportunities for apprentices? That statement shows no consideration of what alternative employment can be found in a community which I understand to be in considerable economic difficulties. We hear those arguments from Rosyth and from the trade unions. It might have been better had the hon. Lady drifted into the Standing Committee now and again and heard those arguments being repeated hour after hour as we considered the Bill.

[Mr. O'Neill]

Miss Fookes: The hon. Gentleman's point is less than fair. I did not drift into the Committee because I was chairing another Committee, which I am required to do as a member of Mr. Speaker's panel of Chairmen.

Mr. O'Neill: I am sorry about the hon. Lady's priorities, and I accept the point that she made—[HON. MEMBERS: "Withdraw".] I am sorry that the priorities of the House intervened in this way. I did not mean it in the other sense. But the hon. Lady told the House that she was not expert in the workings of the dockyards and then proceeded to make those points, ignoring the fact that 2,000 jobs were lost to the community—2,000 jobs that could have been taken by people apart from those who were prepared to give them up.

Miss Fookes: When I said that I was not expert, I was referring to one specific point. I was asked whether I could suggest ways in which the dockyard could be used for outside work. I said that, in that respect, I could not offer expert advice but I knew that people such as Mr. Johnston, the managing director, had ideas in that direction and I was prepared to accept his view that this could be done. Others also suggested it.

Mr. O'Neill: All that I can say is that work which is being carried out on Merseyside, Tyneside and on the Clyde will go to other parts of the country because of the reorganisation, and that the misery that exists in some areas will be compounded by the foolhardiness of the Government's proposals.

The Bill is bad for workers and for the prospects of ship repair and ship-fitting for the Navy. It will damage the Navy incalculably and will be bad for Britain's security. The only prospect for change is a change of Government and direction so that Britain can be properly defended by people who are happy and confident in the knowledge that their work will continue.

Mr. Lee: I am pleased that the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen) has returned, because even at this late hour I want gently to tease him and ask whether he recalls writing an article in October 1983 in the Economic Affairs magazine entitled

"Agenda for Competitiveness with Compassion."

In it he said:

"The SDP has not yet developed a strategic view on the role of the commercial public sector. Is it just a staging post between public and private ownership, or can it be the vehicle for the imaginative, practical and enthusiastic development of industrial democracy . . . Franchising could be a very attractive approach for it provides a way of enabling enterprises to act competitively, but within a framework which protects the public interest in a way which entirely unregulated competition would not."

Dr. Owen: Why does the Minister not go on to mention the passage about the dockyards and why that is not appropriate for the dockyards? It is in the same speech.

Mr. Lee: It is a long speech.

Dr. Owen: I think that it would be appropriate.

Mr. Lee: Certainly, the dockyards were referred to, but those quotes stand. As I said in my opening comments, I was half teasing the right hon. Gentleman. Nevertheless, he flirted with franchising at that time.

I have no intention of repeating all the arguments used on Second Reading, in the 25 Committee sittings or today on Report. As my hon. Friend the Minister said earlier, over the years our naval dockyards have had any number of reports and investigations, and have been calling out for radical change. The Bill will introduce commercial management and, for the first time, a real separation between the Royal Navy as customer and the dockyards as supplier. Financial benefits will come to taxpayers, especially in the long term. The Navy will benefit from greater efficiency and the speedy return to operational service of its fleet.

I am grateful for the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth, Drake (Miss Fookes), who has taken a deep and continuing interest in the progress of the Bill and in the dockyards. I am sorry about some of the remarks made in criticism of her. Regarding terms and conditions, I am happy to give her the assurance for which she asks. TUPE will apply, and was covered extensively in the earlier speeches of my hon. Friend the Minister.

I am also grateful for the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Norfolk, North-West (Mr. Bellingham) and for his participation in our lengthy Committee stage. The questions of costs and accountability were fully covered by my hon. Friend the Minister earlier, and I can tell my hon. Friend that VAT is not payable on production work in the dockyards.

Our approach, involving the private sector in management while retaining the physical assets in public ownership, is innovative. It is being studied overseas, and may even have application in other areas of the United Kingdom public sector. I commend it to the House.

Question put, That the Bill be now read the Third time:—

PETITION

Social Security Reform

11.35 pm

Mr. Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire): I seek the permission of the House to present a petition in relation to proposals originally published by the Government in December in the White Paper as a consequence of the social security reviews undertaken by the Secretary of State for Social Services.

The petition has garnered 32,641 signatures since that time, across the length and breadth of the four kingdoms. The petition is addressed to the proposals contained in the White Paper on reform of social security, which will lead to millions of needy people losing benefits. They will seriously affect pensioners, women, young people, the unemployed and those with exceptional needs such as the chronically sick and disabled.

The petition concludes:

"Wherefore your petitioners pray that your honourable House do not proceed with legislation arising from the proposals set out in the White Paper on the reform of social security."

I beg to present the petition.

To lie upon the Table.

Huddersfield School of Architecture

Motion made and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Maude.]

11.36 pm

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield): I am grateful for the privilege and opportunity to introduce the subject of the Huddersfield polytechnic school of architecture by way of an adjournment debate.

This is an appropriate but sad day on which to have the debate. Many polytechnics up and down the country have heard today of further cuts announced by the Government and the National Advisory Body for Public Sector Higher Education. This will affect educational opportunities in our country.

In March 1986, the Secretary of State for Education and Science announced his provisional decision to stop recruitment of students to the undergraduate BA architecture degree and postgraduate diploma in architecture courses at the Huddersfield polytechnic school of architecture, with effect from September 1986. The reason for the decision would make a suitable subject for a doctoral thesis for any student of modern Government processes who wished to illuminate how Government Departments should not assess evidence and make decisions.

The Department of Education and Science made it clear early in the 1980s that it wanted cuts in architectural education. In due course NAB and the University Grants Committee set up a transbinary architecture group, which was otherwise known as the Esher Committee. Its recommendations were considered further by the architectural intake working party AIWP. These are complex acronyms, but I hope that the House will bear with me.

The result was a recommendation that six schools of architecture should be lost to the country either by closure or merger. Since then, four have been deleted from the list, and two remain: Huddersfield and the North-East London polytechnic. At present, both schools are listed for closure.

To make sense of the proposals, we need to consider some history, if the House will bear with me. I remind the House that there are three weeks for appeal against the preliminary decision for closure. There have been three weeks from 11 March to appeal against the preliminary decision on closure. Hon. Members therefore have good reason to appeal on an all-party basis to the Minister to think again before an irrevocable decision is made.

It is important to consider the criteria on which Huddersfield is said to have been judged and failed—location, size, quality and cognate courses. On no reasonable basis can one say that Huddersfield polytechnic school of architecture has failed any of those criteria. In terms of location, the arguments against Huddersfield are the same as those against, for example, Manchester, Glasgow, Liverpool or Edinburgh.

A target of 150 students and 15 staff has been recommended. Huddersfield has 130 students on degree courses and, unlike other schools of architecture, another 70 students taking the higher national diploma for architectural technicians—200 students in total. Also, Huddersfield has a full-time equivalent of 20 staff. In the university sector. six departments have nowhere near as many — for example, Cambridge university, with 110 such students, is much smaller.

In terms of quality, degree and honours degree status was granted by the Council for National Academic Awards in 1983. Unlike many other schools in polytechnics which have lost the ability to give an honours degree or have not yet achieved that status, in 1985 the Royal Institute of British Architects gave the maximum recognition for the longest period in its power to courses at Huddersfield polytechnic. Notes were made on the quality of the courses. Attention has been drawn to aspects of the school's work where the Government wanted to encourage study — for example, advanced work in computer applications in architecture.

In terms of cognate courses, it is true that professional architects and technicians are educated together at the Huddersfield school, which must surely be a plus. Related courses in art, design and building are run in parallel with architectural courses. The teaching staff at the polytechnic are from several departments. The architectural department is in the school of engineering. The criteria in the cognate disciplines are a model for other schools of architecture.

The decision against the Huddersfield school and NELP was the result of a long process. Before coming to a final decision, Ministers must weigh the closure of Huddersfield and NELP against the original policy objectives for pursuing cuts in architecture. We believe that those policies were wrong-headed. The thrust of the closures is to reduce expenditure on architectural education, to stabilise the size of the architectural profession, to prevent the unemployment of graduates from these schools and to protect the profession's income levels. Those criteria are hopeless. Paring the system down to two schools of architecture will not result in significant overall savings. If the Government had taken on the profession more boldly and had cut architectural education back from seven to five years, they might have done something more sensible.

Better alternatives exist in terms of reducing costs. We now know that the statistical basis for the Esher report's diagnosis of the problems was faulty. The architectural profession, rather than being stabilised, will be reduced by a third.

The report also failed to look at the impact of European Community regulations on the United Kingdom. In the United Kingdom, 95 per cent. of our architecture graduates get jobs; indeed, 100 per cent. of the graduates of the Huddersfield school get jobs in architecture. In line with the European influence on our lives, European graduates from any part of the EEC will be able to come to practise in Britain. Last year, almost 100 per cent. of the graduates of the two schools of architecture in Dublin were unemployed. If we do not have our own supply of architects, those graduates will be able to seek employment in Britain.

This policy is hardly in line with the deregulation philosophy for trades and professions to which the Government are supposed to be committed. We need more architects. Yesterday I telephoned eight architects in Yorkshire, and all were looking for architectural staff but could not find them. In West Yorkshire, Yorkshire and Humberside we desperately need more architects to rebuild the infrastructure—private and public—because it is in such a desperate state.

Mr. Richard Wainwright (Colne Valley): In pursuance of the point which the hon. Gentleman has reached, does he agree that in West Yorkshire, in Huddersfield and in the architectural profession generally it has been well noted that in all these recent inquiries into the Huddersfield school of architecture there were only two at which the polytechnic authorities had a fair and proper chance to set forth the record of the school and its plans? In those two cases, the reputation of the school was fully vindicated and both the National Advisory Committee and RIBA have endorsed the claims for the Huddersfield polytechnic school to continue.

Mr. Sheerman: The hon. Gentleman is absolutely right. Whenever the school got the opportunity to put its case to an impartial group of assessors, their assessment of the quality of the school and its importance were in favour of the continuation of the school.

Anyone who looks at the decision-making process with regard to schools of architecture will be amazed. There has been a shambles of decision-making. None of the rules of natural justice has applied in this case. The outcome borders on the irrational. There has been no sensible and fair assessment of the general objectives of Government policy in relation to schools of architecture or the fair application of the criteria originally laid down.

What makes me most cross is that the staff of the department and the students have been appallingly treated. Many young people's aspirations to become architects will be dashed by the Government's decision. The Government have given the money for next year's courses but they have said that the first-year course cannot recruit in 1986. That means that young people in Huddersfield will not have a chance to become architects. Their futures have been ruined by the dilly-dallying, shilly-shallying attitude of the Secretary of State. It is a cruel thing to do to young people on the threshold of a career.

Irrationality breeds a lack of confidence in the administration and in its decision-making. It forces institutions, faced by that type of irrational behaviour, to go in for political in-fighting and to pull weight wherever they can. That is the only reason I can find for the fact that Huddersfield and the North-East London polytechnic are the only schools of architecture to be closed. It is not on the basis of qualtiy or of any rational criteria but because they did not have friends at court or political muscle which could pull behind the scenes to keep them in business.

The House should hear the case for the Huddersfield polytechnic. The Minister still has a chance to reverse the decision and to make sure that a thriving school that does so much for the community and the nation will succeed in future.

Mr. John Whitfield (Dewsbury): I am grateful to the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman) for permitting me a short space of time before my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary replies to back up the majority of the points that he has made. The hon. Gentleman packed many facts into his speech and I am sure that my hon. Friend will have taken those fully on board.

The one point that I want to make is that, although the Government, rightly, are seriously examining the number of polytechnic places which are, or ought be be, properly available throughout Britain, in the future of the Huddersfield school of architecture a rather curious process of elimination has been embarked upon. That is illustrated most clearly by the fact that the Huddersfield school of architecture has recently been granted the right to award honours degrees in architecture whereas the Leeds school of architecture, which is only just down the road for those who are not familiar with our part of the world, has recently lost that right.

My hon. Friend may rightly say that perhaps there are too many schools of architecture in the country—there are two schools in Manchester and Liverpool, and one in Huddersfield, Leeds and Hull in our part of the world. It is extraordinary, however, that of those schools the Huddersfield school of architecture should, within a short space of time of being granted the right to award honours degrees, be faced with closure.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Science (Mr. George Walden): I am grateful to the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman) for bringing to the attention of the House his concern over the provisional decision by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science to direct that the part I course in architecture at Huddersfield polytechnic should cease to be provided. This provisional decision was relayed to the polytechnic and its maintaining authority in a letter from the Department dated 7 March 1986.

The hon. Gentleman talked about the complexities of a doctoral thesis, but I want to stress that one man's doctoral thesis is another man's scrupulously careful procedures. It is important that hon. Members fully understand the background from which this provisional conclusion has emerged.

The number of registered architects has risen over the 12 years from 1973 to 1985 by no less than 21 per cent., leading inevitably to under-employment within the profession and a resultant fall in real earnings. The quarterly statistics produced by the professional body, the Royal Institute of British Architects, show that to be the case. At the same time, as I remind hon. Members, the education and training requirement for architects prior to registration is seven years—I am glad that the hon. Gentleman alluded to that—of which five are spent in full-time study, each of them grant-aided in respect of tuition fees and maintenance from public funds. That means, if I may borrow a rather telling phrase from the Financial Times, that "three architectural students take up as much in grant as five ordinary undergraduates, a fact not well appreciated by the general public."

It was against a background of excess supply that the transbinary architecture group, chaired by Lord Esher, and so known as the Esher group, was established in 1983, under the aegis of the National Advisory Body for Public Sector Higher Education and the University Grants Committee. The group reported in September 1984. The central recommendation of the Esher group was that policy should be directed to stabilise the size of the profession at the level it would reach by 1990, when the 1984 student intakes had qualified. Esher forecast that this would give a profession in the 1990s of about 31,000 architects. The fact is that since publication of the report numbers have continued to increase at a rate that was underestimated by Esher, so that the total number of architects on the statutory register maintained by the Architects Registration Council of the United Kingdom already stood at 29,692 at 31 December 1985.

The conclusions of the Esher group on the need to stabilise the size of the profession by limiting intakes to training were accepted by both the National Advisory Body and by the University Grants Committee. They have also been accepted by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. Following acceptance by the NAB and the UGC of the central recommendations of the Esher report, a joint architecture intakes working party was established to consider how the reductions recommended by Esher might be implemented and to advise its parent bodies accordingly. The working party reported in August 1985.

When it considered the AIWP's proposals, the NAB board accepted the recommendation that the Huddersfield and NELP school should be closed. Subsequently, the NAB committee accepted the board's advice in respect of NELP, but recommended that an intake be maintained in 1986 at Huddersfield. It resolved, however, to review intakes at Huddersfield in the context of the NAB's 1987-88 planning exercise in the light of further consideration of the factual material. In a statement on 20 December 1985, in response to NAB's advice about academic provision and the distribution of the advance further education pool in 1986-87—I apologise for all this jargon, but I think that most hon. Members are familiar with it—my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State indicated that he could not accept the NAB's advice that the reduction in intakes to public sector part I architecture courses should be accomplished solely by the closure of the NELP school. Instead, he said that he would review the position over one or two months. That is another example of the extraordinary care and scrupulousness with which the provisional decisions were taken.

In the light of that further review, my right hon. Friend reached his provisional decision that there should be no intake to the part I course at Huddersfield in 1986

The preparatory work for the review was undertaken by officials of my Department. Corrections and clarifications of the factual information before the AIWP and NAB were sought and meetings arranged between officials and representatives of both Huddersfield and NELP. Thus an opportunity was afforded to both polytechnics to comment on factual and other aspects of the reviews undertaken successively by the Esher group, the AIWP and the NAB. Thereafter, at the request of the Department, further information was submitted by both institutions. Officials reported the results of this work to my right hon. Friend.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett (Denton and Reddish): Can the Minister confirm that provisional offers have been made to students for the start of the autumn term of the 1986 course? Is it not grossly unfair to snatch away those provisional offers at this stage?

Mr. Walden: Not for the first time, the hon. Gentleman is dramatising the situation. I am describing how carefully and considerately we approached an admittedly difficult question, which will inevitably—I sympathise with the spirit of what the hon. Gentleman says—involve some discomfort, to put it mildly, to some students.

In the light of the work undertaken by officials, my right hon. Friend noted that the AIWP report had described the criteria adopted for the purposes of its work but had not indicated how the working party had applied those criteria to produce its recommendations involving institutional closures. As a first step, therefore, he considered whether the working party had acted reasonably in its general approach in selecting the criteria for its review and in seeking evidence from those it had approached. In the light of the available evidence, he was satisfied as to the reasonableness of the AIWP's general approach. Thereafter, he considered whether on the basis of the evidence before the working party, amended on points of fact as necessary, it would be reasonable for him to come to the same conclusion, namely, that the part I courses in architecture at Huddersfield and NELP should have zero intakes in 1986. He carefully reviewed the sources of information used by the working party and NAB, together with the corrections and clarifications reported to him by officials.

The AIWP has identified four criteria as relevant to its consideration of institutional allocations. As the hon. Member for Huddersfield said, these were size, location, quality and relationship to cognate disciplines. In practice, a fifth criterion must be added, since the working party received evidence on the resources available to architecture schools as one factor underpinning the quality of existing courses and their potential for future development and expansion.

With regard to school size, the first criterion, my right hon. Friend noted that the full-time equivalent numbers in 1984-85 undertaking architectural training at Huddersfield polytechnic were the lowest of all public sector schools regardless of whether allowance was made for overseas and full-cost students. As for location, the second criterion, Huddersfield's school is situated in one of the main concentrations of provision identified by the Esher report. In the light of provision accessible elsewhere in the region, the role of the Huddersfield school in relation to continuing professional development was also not regarded by my right hon. Friend as sufficient to exclude it from further consideration.

Satisfied that it was not unreasonable on the criteria of size and location to consider the cessation of intakes to the part I course at Huddersfield, my right hon. Friend considered the more judgmental criteria of resources, quality of work and relationship with cognate disciplines. It was noted that the polytechnic had challenged some of the judgments made by Her Majesty's Inspectorate with regard to resources available to the school, but it was considered, in any event, that the school's resources did not emerge as superior to those available to the other schools located in the area.

As to quality and relationship to cognate courses, my right hon. Friend had close regard to the advice of HMI that while all public sector architecture schools were clearly above an acceptable threshold of quality, there were perceptible differences between them which facilitated the identification, within that range, of those schools which were above and those which were below average quality. My right hon. Friend concluded, in the light of HMI advice — which remained as given to AIWP and NAB — that closure of the school at Huddersfield in the context of an overall reduction in intakes would not represent a significant loss of quality from architectural training.

Mr. Sheerman: Is it not a fact that HMI has never sent an inspector who specialises in architecture to Huddersfield polytechnic? There has been no proper assessment at any time by HMI of the quality of that school.

Mr. Walden: The hon. Gentleman is casting aspersions on the work of HMI, as I understand it. May I reiterate what I said earlier on numerous occasions throughout my speech? My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State made a careful review of all the steps taken before reaching his provisional decision. I think that it is important, and that it will be helpful to all hon. Members if I get the Government's view on record.

My right hon. Friend also took account of factual material bearing on quality and relationship to cognate disciplines, to which attention had been drawn by representatives of the polytechnic in its discussion with officials. In this context, the reported views of the validating body, the CNAA, and the professional body, RIBA, were noted. In the judgment of my right hon. Friend, however, these did not by themselves render unreasonable the identification of the school at Huddersfield polytechnic for a zero intake to its part I course in 1986.

It was against that background that my right hon. Friend took his provisional decision that there should be no intakes to the part 1 course at Huddersfield in 1986. I must however re-emphasise, as I have on several occasions during my speech, the essentially provisional nature of the decision, the basis of which was set out in the Department's letter of 7 March to the polytechnic's maintaining authority, which also conveyed an invitation to make further representations in the light of its contents.

I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Dewsbury (Mr. Whitfield) for attending the debate, because the broader hearing the Government case has the better we like it. I can assure the hon. Member for Huddersfield, my hon. Friend the Member for Dewsbury and other hon. Members that my right hon. Friend will give careful consideration to whatever representations are made by the deputation that he will shortly receive from the polytechnic and the maintaining authority. He will proceed to a final decision only in the light of those representations.

It was valuable for me and for the Government to hear the views of the hon. Member for Huddersfield, and I sympathise with his concern and with the concerns of his constituents. I know that other hon. Members also have an indirect but vital interest in this matter and I was grateful to hear their comments tonight. I hope that I have stressed sufficiently in my remarks that the Government have adopted a cautious approach to this complicated problem. The European dimension raised by the hon. Member for Huddersfield introduces a further complexity into this matter.

Mrs. Elizabeth Peacock (Batley and Spen): Will my hon. Friend note that there are many students with an offer from Huddersfield who do not know where they stand at present? Will he assure us that a decision will be taken reasonably quickly so that these young people will know whether or not they have a place at Huddersfield?

Mr. Walden: I appreciate the element of uncertainty which my hon. Friend has raised and I hope that in my speech I have stressed that inevitably a balance must be struck between the need for a reasonably prompt decision on the one hand, and on the other the equally pressing need for careful review of this extremely complicated situation.

I was about to conclude my remarks by mentioning the European dimension raised by the hon. Member for Huddersfield. In this connection, it has been argued that the new directive for freer movement will facilitate a net outflow of registered architects to Europe and may therefore have the effect of reducing the number of practising architects in the United Kingdom. On the other hand, the issue of the EC directive was discussed by both the NAB board and committee, which foresaw an influx of European-trained architects into the United Kingdom, which would, of course, exacerbate the over-provision of training places already identified by the Esher group.

Oral Answers to Questions

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Fontainebleau Agreement

2. Mrs. Clywd asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he is satisfied with the implementation of the Fontainebleau agreement; and if he will make a statement.

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Sir Geoffrey Howe): Following the agreement on control of Community spending reached at Fontainebleau last year, agricultural prices were reduced by 3·5 per cent. in real terms. The new own resources decision, which provides for abatement of the United Kingdom's budget contribution, has come into force. Our 1984 VAT abatement of £605 million has been paid and the abatements being made to our monthly VAT contributions in respect of 1985 will be worth at least £830 million. These figures demonstrate the value of the Fontainebleau agreement to Britain. As I have frequently made clear, reform, especially of the CAP, must be pursued year by year, which is exactly what we are doing.

Mrs. Clwyd: Is it true that the EEC budget crisis is back with a vengeance, that it never went away and that it will be impossible to fund regional and social programmes already in the pipeline, which especially benefit the United Kingdom, without a further increase over and above the 1·4 per cent. increased VAT ceiling in the current year?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The hon. Lady should not jump to that latter conclusion. The EEC, as with almost all other organisations, must control its spending and revenue. The battle to secure budget discipline is a battle without end which will be sustained.

Sir Anthony Meyer: Is it not clear that there will be mounting difficulties in the EEC and that it is, therefore, of the utmost importance to take effective decisions to safeguard the Community and the interests of Britain? Is not the Single European Act, modest though it is, an essential first step in that direction, and should it not be fully supported?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: My hon. Friend has put his finger precisely on the merits of the Single European Act from his point of view. The House will have the opportunity to debate it more fully in due course.

Mr. Marlow: Will my right hon. and learned Friend confirm that whatever reforms there have been in the CAP, the problems of the CAP have accelerated to a greater extent than have the reforms? Will he also confirm that he, like many of us, predicted last year that there would be a massive increase in cereal surpluses and also that there was a strong possibility that the dollar might decline and, therefore, that there is no justification whatever for the Community seeking more money for that purpose?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: Plainly it is desirable that the Community should seek to live within the money that has been allotted to it under the existing own resources provision. The change in the dollar-ecu rate is bound to create problems, as was forecast, but that fact must be put in the wider context. The difficulties facing agriculture are not confined to the European Community. Throughout the world agriculture is facing a near crisis of overproduction, caused to a large extent by improvements in technology. The Community is not alone in having surpluses. The world cereal stock is estimated to exceed 190 million tonnes, of which almost half comes from the United States.

Mr. George Robertson: Is the Secretary of State aware that when the Fontainebleau agreement was brought back to the House its foundation was budget discipline? The Foreign Secretary now tells us that budget discipline is a battle without end. As the battle is being lost everywhere that it is being fought, and as the financial resources of the Community will run out probably when the Secretary of State takes over the chairmanship of the Council of Ministers, how long will the Fontainebleau basic agreement last? As our rebate is tied directly to the 1·4 per cent. VAT ceiling of the EEC, for how long will the rebate continue in existence while CAP surpluses continue to wreak havoc on the Community's budget?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The hon. Gentleman has made three points. First, it is important to control expenditure and to sustain budget discipline. It is always heart-warming to have support for that proposition from the Opposition.

Secondly, the hon. Gentleman says that it is important to achieve and to sustain continuing reform of the CAP. It is heart-warming, too, to hear that proposition advanced by the Opposition.

Thirdly, it is desirable that the Fontainebleau agreement should remain in existence for as long as possible to sustain the extremely beneficial arrangements for the United Kingdom. I endorse all three propositions.

Chilean Soldiers (Training)

3. Mr. Flannery asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if any soldiers or officers of the Chilean Government are presently being trained in the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Tim Eggar): We do provide some training for Chilean armed forces personnel in the United Kingdom, but do not allocate places to Chileans on courses covering internal security techniques.

Mr. Flannery: Is not this provision of training utterly disgraceful? The Minister's reply is rather like that of the second housemaid who said that her baby was only a little one. The reality is that a principle is involved. That brute beast Pinochet is in charge of Chile and the people of Chile are steadily going for his throat to get rid of him. Are we not to change a policy that has applauded his master's voice in Washington with Marcos, Duvalier, Samosa and company? Why do we not denounce Pinochet democratically in our own right, remove anything to do with him from Britain and support the people of Chile in their drive towards democracy?

Mr. Eggar: It is sad that the hon. Gentleman has such a partial view of affairs. We have continued to make clear our concern about the Chilean Government's human rights record. We supported both the resolution of 14 March of the United Nations Commission on Human Rights, which criticised Chile's record, and the European Community's presidency statement of 18 March, which expressed concern about restrictions on freedom in Chile.

Sir Frederic Bennett: If we are to have any sort of objective appraisal of these matters, should the House not recall that at the time of the Falklands conflict we were by no means unhappy to receive indirect assistance from the Chileans? I wonder whether my hon. Friend could put in the Library a list of the other countries, about which no complaint seems to be made, which send members of their armed forces to be trained in Britain, including Libya?

Mr. Eggar: I have taken careful note of what my right hon. Friend has said. I must tell him that details of bilateral military training involving all countries are kept confidential.

Mr. Winnick: Does the Minister realise how deplorable it is to have such close collaboration with a bloodstained dictatorship, such as the Chilean junta? Is it not the height of hypocrisy for Tory Members to denounce repression in eastern Europe while being only too pleased to have this form of collaboration with the regime in Chile?

Mr. Eggar: We have always made it clear that we condemn abuses of human rights wherever they may occur.

Mr. Dalyell: How do the Government know whether or not their help will be used to develop internal techniques? What do the Chilean forces have to do other than concentrate on internal affairs? That is what they are about.

Mr. Eggar: As I have already made clear to the House, we have made it our policy not to allocate places for military training within the United Kingdom on courses which cover internal security techniques.

Mr. Hill: Does my hon. Friend agree that only countries with which we enjoy friendly relations should receive training facilities in Britain? Some of the countries which have asked for military training here for their forces are anti-European or anti-United Kingdom.

Mr. Eggar: We take a number of factors into consideration when military training is requested by Third-world countries. As I said to my right hon. Friend the Member for Torbay (Sir F. Bennett), the details of those countries which send officers to this country for training are confidential.

Mr. Foulkes: Do the Government not recognise from experience in Haiti and the Philippines that external pressure is important in dealing with dictators? Do the Government not also recognise that by supporting the dictator Pinochet and training his troops they are undermining the democratic forces of the Right as well as of the Left in Chile? In view of the strong views expressed in the House today, will the Government rethink this policy immediately?

Mr. Eggar: Our policy is absolutely clear. We have made clear our concern about the position on human rights in Chile by our support for the United Nations High Commission for Refugees' announcement and for the EC presidency. There can be no doubt about our views on human rights in Chile.

Mr. Flannery: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. In view of the unsatisfactory nature of those replies, which mean that we are supporting a brutal dictatorship, I reserve the right to raise this matter on the Adjournment.

Syrian Jews

4. Mr. Merlyn Rees asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assurances he sought during recent discussions with the Syrian Foreign Minister that those Syrian Jews seeking to emigrate would now be allowed to do so; and if he will make a statement.

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. Tim Renton): The local Jewish community has made it clear in the past that it does not wish its conditions to form part of Western ministerial exchanges with the Syrian Government. We have nevertheless left the Syrian Foreign Minister in no doubt of the strong feelings in this country on the question of human rights in Syria.

Mr. Rees: Can the Minister of State help, perhaps by getting a parliamentary delegation to go and see the conditions in which about 4,500 Jews are living in Syria? Given the nature of the middle east, the conditions cannot be good, but the more information we have the better, because we must do something to get these people out of Syria.

Mr. Renton: I listened carefully to what the right hon. Gentleman said. I am not certain that a parliamentary delegation would necessarily be the right avenue. However, he should discuss it, if he has not already done so, with Amnesty International. I understand the concern that he expresses. When I was in Damascus in December I raised the issue of a local Jewish community informally with a Jewish business man there. I was told that the only condition with which they are having real difficulty at the moment is the inability to travel outside Syria. Other than that, in many ways their conditions are much the same as those of other Syrian citizens.

Mr. Walters: In the course of his talks, did my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary also assure the Syrian Foreign Minister that Her Majesty's Government fully appreciated Syrian feeling about the future of the 100,000 Syrian civilians thrown out of Golan by the Israelis in 1967——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question concerns Syrian Jews.

Mr. Walters: —and that feelings about humanitarian problems were not restricted to one section only?

Mr. Renton: Neither my right hon. and learned Friend nor I raised the question of the Syrians who have been dispossessed as a result of the Israeli occupation of the Golan Heights. However, I accept what my hon. Friend has said. Syria is a party to the conflict between the Arabs and Israel. Syrian territory, the Golan, is occupied by Israel. We very much wish to see Syria play a constructive and helpful part in any peace settlement.

Mr. Speaker: I draw the attention of the House to the fact that this question concerns Syrian Jews.

Mr. Faulds: May I confirm what the hon. Gentleman has just said? On a previous visit to Syria I was told by a spokesman for the Jewish community that their lot was the much easier the less intervention and propaganda were made about their position.

Mr. Renton: I thank the hon. Gentleman for what he has said. It is always pleasant to have one's remarks fully corroborated, from whatever source in the House.

Mr. Cyril D. Townsend: What assurance has my hon. Friend had from the Israeli authorities that Syrian Jews emigrating to Israel will not end up dispossessing and disfranchising Palestinians on the West Bank and in Gaza?

Mr. Renton: The number of Syrian Jews emigrating to Israel at present is limited. We have an idea that a small number have had permission to leave. I understand my hon. Friend's point, but the numbers involved could only be very small.

Mr. Marlow: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I am sure that you are aware——

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Marlow: rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I did not call the hon. Gentleman.

Iran-Iraq War

5. Dr. M. S. Miller asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what preparations he is making for a new initiative to resolve the Iran-Iraq war in the context of the forthcoming British presidency of the European Economic Community.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The Iran-Iraq conflict is a prominent item on the agenda of European Community Foreign Ministers. With the other member states, we shall continue to press for the early implementation of Security Council resolution 582, and to support the mediation efforts of the United Nations Secretary-General.

Dr. Miller: I thank the right hon. and learned Gentleman for his reply, but will he go a little further than that? When he assumes the presidency of the Economic Community, will he take a very early opportunity to impress upon his counterparts the necessity to desist from supplying all weapons of war to that area, and also to make some sort of representation to the Soviet Union to do the same?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I assure the hon. Gentleman that we have been and will continue to be active in the Security Council itself and in the European Community in support of pressing for the acceptance of Security Council resolution 582. As the hon. Gentleman knows, our policy is not to sell defence-related equipment that could significantly enhance the capability of either side to prolong or exacerbate the conflict. That shows our own judgment on the merits of that policy.

Mr. David Howell: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that the current collapse in oil prices could have a radical effect on the outcome and progress of the Iran-Iraq war? Is that not just one of the foreign policy consequences in the Gulf, following the collapse in oil prices? Is not now the time to pursue talks, for instance with the Saudis and other interested parties in the area, on the lines that I think my right hon. and learned Friend himself suggested in Riyadh a few months ago?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: It is possible that the change in the state of the oil market will change conditions in a fashion that will create another possible opening for activity of the sort that my right hon. Friend has in mind. I shall certainly bear his suggestion in mind. As he will recall, my hon. Friend the Minister of State recently visited the Gulf to discuss the issue with a number of Gulf states, as I had done previously with Saudi Arabia. We shall continue to press the case in that way.

Mr. Alton: Given the complaint only last week by the Saudi Arabian Foreign Minister that the continued provision of aquatic craft and bridge-building kits, for instance, in the Iraq-Iran conflict is prolonging the war, how does the right hon. and learned Gentleman distinguish between what he referred to as lethal and non-lethal weapons on a previous occasion?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: We distinguish in that way by making sure that every application for the export of defence-related equipment is rigorously scrutinised to ensure that all items are excluded that could contribute in the way that I have described to prolonging or exacerbating the conflict.

Mr. Latham: Is it not clear beyond any doubt that gas and chemical weapons have been used in this terrible war? Who is supplying them? What is Britain, as part of the United Nations, doing to try to stop it?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: There is no doubt, from a presidential statement at the United Nations Security Council on 20 March, that there is firm evidence that Iraq has used chemical weapons. We condemn the use of chemical weapons, wherever and whenever it occurs. We have taken action jointly with our Community partners —now more than 12 months ago—to ensure that we do not export materials that could be used for that purpose. However, I entirely agree with my hon. Friend about the importance of doing everything that we possibly can to stop the use of these appalling weapons in this or any other conflict.

Economic Summit

6. Mr. Blair asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent discussions he has held in the European Community Foreign Affairs Council concerning the forthcoming world economic summit.

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mrs. Lynda Chalker): The Tokyo economic summit has not been on the agenda of this year's Foreign Affairs Council meetings. But world economic issues are regularly discussed at international meetings such as those of the FAC. They include developments in the world economy such as oil prices and debt problems and also trade issues, which are likely to be discussed at the Tokyo summit.

Mr. Blair: Does the Minister agree that one of the main items on the agenda should be international debt? Does she further agree that falling oil prices for oil-exporting countries, just as falling commodity prices for African countries, have intensified their debt problem in a way that is not offset by the increase in world growth? Will the hon. Lady therefore give an undertaking that the Government will support moves, first, to put life into the ailing Baker plan for international debt, and, secondly, to give the type of increase in funding to the World Bank that matches resources to the scale of the problem?

Mrs. Chalker: I understand the hon. Gentleman's concern. There are no formal agendas for summit meetings, as they are matters for Heads of State and Governments. Questions of policy are addressed by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister. I shall bring the hon. Gentleman's remarks to the notice of the Prime Minister. The fall in oil prices causes concern in all parts of the world. I cannot imagine that any discussion of this nature could possibly take place without the references that the hon. Gentleman mentioned.

Mr. Budgen: Does my hon. Friend agree that there is something to be said for telling the EEC that this country does not believe in a lot of pretentious posturing over foreign affairs? In particular, this country does not believe that there is any such thing as EEC foreign policy. It would be better if the EEC concentrated on getting its own finances in order. Does my hon. Friend accept that that might be achieved by telling the EEC that there will be no increase to 1·6 per cent. in our VAT contribution?

Mrs. Chalker: I hope my hon. Friend meant 1·4 per cent. It is important that there should not be posturing. We need to discuss issues with our colleagues in the EEC, and what we want in summit meetings is a free flow of discussion. That is the value of discussion. If there were the posturing that my hon. Friend spoke about, that would destroy the value of discussion.

Mr. Deakins: During our presidency of the EEC in the next six months, will the Minister consider the possibility of inviting observers from the poor states of the world, from UNCTAD and from the United Nations to attend the Tokyo economic summit? At present it is a grouping of rich nations trying to settle the world's economic affairs in their own interests.

Mrs. Chalker: The hon. Gentleman should be under no illusions. The countries which are represented at summit meetings are well aware of the extreme needs of some of the poorer nations. What comes up on the agenda is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, but I shall make sure that the hon. Gentleman's remarks are brought to her attention.

Mr. Rathbone: If that subject is not on the Council's agenda, can my hon. Friend say whether the control of the threat of drugs is on the agenda? If so, the European Community could support my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary's efforts, which he made during his visits to India and to Pakistan to increase our influence in those countries, to minimise that threat.

Mrs. Chalker: I can well understand my hon. Friend's concern about this matter. There are regular discussions between the Interior and Home Ministers. I am sure that the control and the threat of drugs is a matter for all nations.

I cannot give my hon. Friend a definite clue whether it will be discussed at the meeting or whether it will be part of the formal agenda. I can only say that because the control of drug taking and drug peddling in Britain remains a special concern of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, I am sure that it will be discussed at some stage.

Latin America (Debt Repayment)

7. Mr. Eastham asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent discussions he has held with Latin American Governments concerning their repayment of debts; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: The heavy debt burden borne by many Latin American Governments continues to cause us concern; this problem is frequently discussed in the course of our contacts with their Governments.

Mr. Eastham: In view of the serious outflow of funding for poor Latin American countries and as that is being compounded by the loss of revenues from oil, would it not be a good thing if the Government took some intitiative, perhaps with their EEC partners, to organise a conference at which sane policies could be introduced regarding pledges on capping interest rates to allow those countries to get over this most difficult period?

Mrs. Chalker: There is no doubt that the question of reducing the pressures on Latin American countries is taken up not only by the IMF, but by the World Bank. I believe that the Baker initiative, which is being applied to middle income debtors and, indeed, to those who have greater problems—the poorer debtors of whom the hon. Gentleman spoke—will allow those donors to look at the needs of those countries.

The effect of the oil price on those debtor countries varies, because it depends on whether they are importers or exporters. The matter needs to be looked at on a case-by-case basis. That is why we support the Baker initiative. We welcome the Baker proposal that emphasis should be put on growth in those countries to overcome their problems.

Mr. Tom Clarke: Does the hon. Lady accept that the Baker initiative in itself is hardly sufficient to deal with the enormous world debt crisis, to which the American economy has made a contribution? Does she accept that the Third world is becoming fed up with financing the American deficit, and it is time we made representations in that direction?

Mrs. Chalker: There is no easy answer to anybody's debt problem. To get out of debt is a much harder job than it ever was to get into it. The duty of the developed countries is to promote non-inflationary growth in the world economy so that, by means of open markets, debtor countries can expand and begin to pull back the horrific debt problem. There is no easy answer for developed nations, and certainly none for the underdeveloped nations.

Nicaragua

8. Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the Government's policy concerning the provision of aid by the United States of America to the Contras in Nicaragua; and if this policy has been communicated to the United States.

13. Mr. Madden asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will call for an early meeting of the European Economic Community Council to consider issues raised by United States military aid to the Contras in Nicaragua.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: We support the Contadora peace initiative and, together with our European partners, publicly welcomed the impetus given to Contadora in January by the Carabelleda declaration. We do not believe that the problems of Central America can be solved by armed force. The United States Government are well aware of our views. A further opportunity to discuss the matter with Community Foreign Ministers will arise on 21 April.

Mr. Banks: Has the Secretary of State communicated directly to the American Government the point that funding the Contras amounts to international terrorism and must be condemned by all civilised people?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: We advocate a political solution through the Contadora process rather than a military solution. Nicaragua should be ready to negotiate seriously on the basis of the Contadora objectives and avoid such actions as the recent incursion into Honduras. I repeat that we do not believe that the region's problems can be resolved by armed force. We constantly urge restraint on all sides. We regularly discuss important questions, including the situation in Central America, with the United States and it is well aware of our views.

Mr. Madden: Will the Foreign Secretary dissociate the British Government completely from American support of the Contras, who are guilty of brutal terrorism and of attempting to overthrow a democratically elected Government by force? Does he realise that, unless the British Government take a more robust line in that respect, their condemnation of international terrorism is rendered less effective and appears partial and highly selective?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The hon. Gentleman must understand what I have just said. We discuss this matter regularly with our Community partners. We have made clear our view that the problems of the region cannot be solved by military means. A solution should come from the region itself. That is why we give our strong support, together with our colleagues in the European Council, to the Contadora process.

Mr. Jackson: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that there is a real danger that American policy in Nicaragua may fall between two stools, neither overturning the Government there, nor reconciling Nicaragua to Western interests?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: That is at heart a matter for the United States, and it is one of the questions that has led to differing views being taken by the two Houses of Congress on the proposal at present before them.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels: Does my right hon. and learned Friend consider it wise for any local authority to twin with Nicaragua, bearing in mind that Leicester city council has announced just that? Does he consider that that might be embarrassing to the——

Mr. Speaker: Order. Funded by America? A bit wide, I think.

Mr. Bruinvels: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Gentleman must be much more sophisticated than that.

Mr. Bruinvels: I thought that I had made it clear that I was referring to the role of the Contras and asking whether it was embarrassing for the Government to have any connection with the Contras on this.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question concerns aid from the United States Government to the Contras.

Mr. Ernie Ross: Should not the Foreign Secretary, as he has already said to the House, be building on the clear difference that there is between the two Houses of Congress in the United States and the President and giving support to those forces in America who realise that President Reagan's initiative, which appears to be his own, will not help the Contras of Central America? Should he not be assisting those in America who believe that the best way forward is to work with the members of the Contadora group and to meet the democratically elected Government of Nicaragua?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I have made it plain in answer to almost every one of the questions so far asked on this matter that the United States Government are well aware of our views on this question, upon which we have our own policy. We support a comprehensive and verifiable Contadora agreement, based on the well-known objectives of that process. We believe that the matter should be resolved by a political solution rather than by military means.

Mr. Cyril D. Townsend: Does my right hon. and learned Friend accept that this is an issue on which frank speaking by friends of the United States must serve the interests both of this country and of the United States? Is it not becoming obvious that the exaggerated and endless claims that Nicaragua represents a major threat to that great country are unhelpful to its European partners?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: One must make a judgment on the claims of both sides. There is no doubt about the extent to which Nicaragua is observed by a number of the others taking part in the Contadora process as having some responsibility for failure to agree in that process. One of the problems identified at the meeting of the Contadora process earlier this week was Nicaragua's refusal to agree on arms levels. That is one of the matters still to be taken into account. We have made it very clear to everyone concerned that we believe that this problem cannot be solved by military means and that it is necessary to have restraint on all sides, and in that sense to seek a solution within the Contadora framework.

Mr. Corbyn: Will the Foreign Secretary accept that the only way to put an end to the bestial killings by the Contra forces in Nicaragua over the past seven years is for the British and European Governments to tell the United States very clearly that it must end all military aid, covert and overt, to Honduras and to the Contra forces themselves, as the only way to bring any peace to that region?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: Even if I shared the hon. Gentleman's diagnosis, I am not at all sure that that would be the right way to advance his case. I shall restate the case that I have made many times this afternoon. We have discussed this matter many times with our Community partners and have reached a common view about the need for this problem to be solved not by military but by political means, and to be solved on the basis of restraint on all sides—I repeat, on all sides. The United States is in no doubt at all about our view.

Mr. Healey: First, may I congratulate the Foreign Secretary on his safe return from what must have been an exhausting visit to the subcontinent, and on his acceptance during his visit of a gift of two sheep, which I trust are both still in good health.

On the question of American aid to the Contras, who are conducting a terrorist compaign against the legally elected Government of Nicaragua, may I take it that the right hon. and learned Gentleman's somewhat encouraging reply to earlier questions implies that he would support all members of the Contadora group in opposing military aid by the United States to those terrorists? Is the right hon. and learned Gentleman aware that the Governments of Honduras and Costa Rica have already made it clear that the American Administration told lies about their view on the issue, and that in a BBC broadcast a week or so ago the American ambassador in Costa Rica also admitted that the American Government had told lies about the views of Contadora countries? Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman therefore confirm my interpretation of his cautious answer as meaning that he opposes American aid to the Contras, who are fighting a terrorist compaign against Nicaragua?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I shall not follow the right hon. Gentleman on his discursive and anecdotal ramble through a series of observations — [HON MEMBERS: "Yes or no?"]—save only to say that the Contadora objectives require all sides to end the support for the subversion of other states. That applies to Nicaragua as well as any other state. It is on that basis—the basis of restraint on all sides—that we urge a conclusion of the problem, on the basis of the Contadora principles.

Namibia

10. Mr. Colvin asked the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if he is planning further consultations with the front-line states about the future of Namibia.

Mrs. Chalker: We remain in touch with front-line states individually on this and other questions.

The last occasion when Namibia was discussed was when my right hon. and learned Friend went to Lusaka for the meeting between the European Community and front-line states.

Mr. Colvin: Has not the time come for Britain to take the initiative in trying to break the deadlock over Namibia? What is my hon. Friend's response to the call for a constitutional conference, to be convened by Britain and attended by all the political parties in Namibia, to try to decide on the best way to implement United Nations resolution 435?

Mrs. Chalker: We remain committed to Security Council resolution 435, which is the internationally agreed basis for a Namibian settlement. I understand the frustration felt because of the lack of progress, but I am convinced that the only real solution to the problems of Namibia lies in the territory being brought to internationally acceptable independence through the early implementation of the United Nations plan. We urgently need, not so much a conference to discuss the implementation of the United Nations plan, as the agreement of the South Africans to fulfil without further delay or precondition their formal commitment to Security Council resolution 435.

I am listening carefully to all that is said on the issue, so that we may have some influence in a positive outcome.

Sir John Biggs-Davison: Can my hon. Friend confirm that under its present Administration Namibia is now free of apartheid?

Mrs. Chalker: I wish that I could confirm that that was true, but unfortunately as yet there is no Namibian legislation to end the key features of racial discrimination. I understand that something now occurring in Namibia may bring that about, but it is not yet in legislation. I must wait to see any legislation before I can answer my hon. Friend in the way that I would like to do.

Mr. George Robertson: Is the Minister aware of how important will be the United States role in any final settlement of the Namibian problem? What future is there for the idea of a concerted engagement while the United States is giving to Unita forces Stinger missiles that will be used against the legal Government of Angola? Does that not destroy any possibility of the United States having any influence in achieving the solution that we all want?

Mrs. Chalker: I understand the hon. Gentleman's frustration. Although I do not share all his views, he knows from our discussions that there is grave anxiety about the interconnections between Angola and Namibia. On another plane, the United States Administration has been making strenuous efforts to be more positive in trying to bring about the implementation of Security Council resolution 435 in Namibia. However, that does not excuse them for the position in which they now find themselves. We must watch the position with great care and try to influence what is happening.

Mr. Cockeram: Will my hon. Friend bear in mind Britain's historic role in that part of Africa, which places us in a unique position to give a lead?

Is it not a matter of regret that Foreign Office Ministers decided not to meet two leading statesmen from Namibia when they visited London recently?

Mrs. Chalker: I understand my hon. Friend's frustration. We have met members of individual parties in circumstances where we do not recognise transitional or interim Governments, provided it is understood that those members of individual parties are requesting meetings with Ministers on that basis. It would not be sensible to meet representatives of a transitional or interim Government. The Namibia Office is on record as saying that it acts for the interim or transitional Government, and will not represent any individual party within that Government. That presents us with a difficult position. We shall continue to do our best to maintain official contacts, and we hope that future offers made by the Foreign Office will not be refused.

South Africa

12. Mr. John Carlisle asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he expects to receive the report of the Commonwealth group of eminent persons who recently visited South Africa.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: Under the terms of the Commonwealth accord, the group is to report within a six-month period to the Heads of Government of the seven Commonwealth states, including the United Kingdom, charged with establishing the group. The present understanding is that this period should begin from 1 January 1986.

Mr. Carlisle: When my right hon. and learned Friend receives the report from the Commonwealth group, will he try to influence other Commonwealth leaders to make sure that the report is received on the basis of trying to promote peaceful dialogue and an end of violence, rather than of concentrating on the evidence of apartheid? Will he use his influence with other Commonwealth Governments to make sure that they do not upset the very happy atmosphere which has existed between the Commonwealth group and the South African Government?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I am glad to hear my hon. Friend's recognition of the importance of the work of the group, which has been widely recognised, not only by the Governments constituting it, but by the front-line states, by the European Community, and more widely still. We certainly wish that its work will enable the process of dialogue, which is crucial to the ending of apartheid, to begin, and we will sustain the group as well as we can in the furtherance of that objective.

Mr. Winnick: Would it not be useful if the Foreign Secretary told his hon. Friend the Member for Luton, North (Mr. Carlisle) that the violence and bloodshed in South Africa arise, first and foremost, from the denial of basic political rights to the majority of the people for so long? Will the Foreign Secretary tell us what pressure is being brought to bear by the British and other European Governments to ensure that Nelson Mandela is freed without conditions, and that this freedom from an imprisonment that has lasted for a quarter of a century is granted as quickly as possible?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: It is unusual for me to be able to respond in an assenting fashion to the hon. Member, but I share his deep concern at the latest violence and deaths in South Africa. I underline, as we have often done, the urgent need for dialogue and for the suspension of violence, and I will continue to urge that on all parties. We have made it plain on many occasions that the unconditional release of Nelson Mandela would constitute a major act of national reconciliation in South Africa, and could provide the impetus for genuine dialogue and peaceful settlement. We have stressed the importance of that move to the South African Government.

Mr. Dykes: If it becomes increasingly clear, as is suspected more and more, that the South African Government have no real intention of introducing profound reforms, will that influence the Government's judgment about the need to proceed to full sanctions after the report has been studied?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I hope that my hon. Friend will preserve a more open mind than is implied by his question. The task of achieving the changes in South Africa that almost every Member of the House considers necessary is, by any standards, a very difficult one. The work being undertaken by the Commonwealth group requires it to make contact with many people, including the South African Government, in a very sensitive fashion. We must all be concerned not to prejudge what may or may not be a consequence of a process which is not yet finished, but rather to do everything in our power to sustain the process, understanding the difficulties on all sides, and not underestimating the urgency of the operation.

Mr. Healey: Will the Foreign Secretary use his influence, which is very substantial, as he has indicated, to ensure that the Commonwealth group makes its report in time for the House to debate it before the summer recess? Because Bishop Tutu has risked imprisonment to call for comprehensive economic sanctions against the South African Government, will he now increase economic pressure on South Africa to ensure the release of Nelson Mandela, so that discussions can take place between him and the South African Government, since Mandela is a representative of the African National Congress, which itself represents the overwhelming majority of black South Africans?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I fear that the right hon. Gentleman appears to base his question on a misunderstanding of what is taking place at the moment. The present stage, which results from the Commonwealth conference, is that the Commonwealth decided on certain measures to be taken, and that position was to be held until the Commonwealth group had completed its work. So it would be quite unfruitful for us now to begin taking isolated action of the kind that he suggests. The important thing is to maintain that atmosphere in which the constituent members of the group and their supporting Governments are reaching out to try to put in the next steps towards dialogue. That is what we are trying to do. I acknowledge the important role that Mr. Nelson Mandela could play, but I do not believe that a sudden resort to sanctions at this stage by us or by anyone else would help in promoting that role.

Mr. Speaker: Mr. Peter Thurnham.

Mr. Healey: Will the Foreign Secretary answer the question?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Departmental Costs

14. Mr. Thurnham asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what are the estimated costs of administering his Department during 1986-87.

Mr. Eggar: The estimated gross running costs of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office during 1986-87 are £369 million for the diplomatic wing and £37 million for the ODA.

Mr. Thurnham: Can my hon. Friend say whether he expects any additional expenses due to increased duties relating to immigration controls and drug trafficking intelligence?

Mr. Eggar: As I think my hon. Friend is aware, we have sent additional staff to posts in the subcontinent and have thus been able to reduce substantially waiting times for first interviews in the subcontinent. The latest figures show that all applicants applying for the first time can expect to be interviewed within 12 months. On the question of drugs, we have put additional resources in London and at overseas posts to try to combat the tremendous drug trafficking problems that we face throughout the world. Both immigration and drugs are good examples of where new demands on the Foreign and Commonwealth Office have been met by the redeployment of existing resources.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Has the Minister read the Public Accounts Committee reports on Foreign Office estates and the exorbitant prices paid by British diplomats, funded by the Exchequer, for accommodation? Does he intend to intervene in the affair of the sale of a flat in Paris for some £800,000 with a view to making economies, when that flat was replaced by another at a cost of £450,000, so we are informed, with additional expenditure of several hundred thousand pounds on doing up the premises and on legal expenses? Where was the economy in that transaction? Should not the Department be reviewing its position?

Mr. Eggar: With regard to the flat in Paris, the Minister's flat has been disposed of and a replacement flat has been purchased at a cost of about £450,000. That new flat is considerably smaller than the existing flat and will be much cheaper to run. As general policy, the Foreign Office is trying to reduce its reliance on rented property, since there is a considerable real increase in rents, and to increase its reliance on owned property.

Mr. Stokes: Is my hon. Friend aware that the Foreign Office has made great strides since the Falklands war, particularly under the leadership of my right hon. and learned Friend? Furthermore, is he aware that we expect our diplomats to be housed properly? Compared with the cost of some local government, the entire cost of the Foreign Office is cheap at the price.

Mr. Eggar: I agree with my hon. Friend. We are in the process of a further rationalisation of our overseas estates to ensure that we dispose of any surplus properties and use the funds so recycled to purchase more appropriate properties where necessary.

Terrorism

15. Mrs. Renée Short asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he will make it his policy to consult his European counterparts to consider imposing sanctions including the suspension of air services on any country that harbours terrorists; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: Before dealing with this question, Mr. Speaker, may I respond to the right hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey), who obliterated the conclusion of our last question? I have not answered the second part of his quesion. It is not possible to say that the proceedings of the Commonwealth group will be determined or conditioned by the needs of the House, but certainly I shall try to bear the needs of the House in mind. The Commonwealth group will operate to achieve its own objectives.

So far as this question is concerned, our experience with economic sanctions has not persuaded us that they are likely to be an effective response to states which are alleged to be harbouring or sponsoring international terrorists. We shall continue to take all possible counter-measures, both nationally and in conjunction with other like-minded countries, to do everything that we can to deter and prevent terrorism.

Mrs. Short: I had hoped that the Secretary of State would be a little more forthcoming in his reply to my question. As the international airline pilots are holding their conference in London, will he send a message to that conference to let them know that Her Majesty's Government support their call for sanctions against countries such as Libya and Syria, for example, and that we shall ban flights to and from those countries as long as they continue their terrosist activities?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I am certainly very much aware of the real interest of the airline pilots in the war against terrorism, including, in particular, airborne terrorism. But the measure suggested in the hon. Lady's question, the suspension of air services, is considered only in the context of states failing to observe the relevant international conventions on hijacking. Not only do we condemn terrorism, but we have taken measures, and will urge those measures wherever necessary, including a full exchange of information and intelligence on terrorists and the effective monitoring of the movement and actions of terrorists to ensure that they are in compliance with the law, and in cases such as Libya, as the House well knows, the conclusion of diplomatic relations, the prohibition of the export of defence equipment and, perhaps most important, the imposition of severe restrictions on Libyan immigration to Britain. We are certainly ready to press for the taking of the most appropriate range of measures as effectively as possible in that kind of case.

Mr. Churchill: In view of what my right hon. and learned Friend has just said about the steps already taken by Her Majesty's Government to prevent air piracy and international terrorism, does he not think that one contribution we could make to the cause of international air safety would be to give their marching orders to those Libyans at present employed at Heathrow and Gatwick airports, with airside security passes provided to them? What advice has his Department given to the Home Department in this regard?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: My hon. Friend recognises the importance of the steps that we have already taken to impose severe restrictions on Libyan emigration to Britain. That control is exercised by my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary. He has made his views on international terrorism very clear. He has made it equally clear that he is willing to act against those who seek to import violence, and he has the particular measures under constant review.

European Community (Foreign Affairs Council)

16. Mr. James Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent discussions have been held in the European Community Foreign Affairs Council regarding a supplementary budget later in the current year; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: The most recent discussion was during the Council of Finance Ministers held at the same time as the Foreign Affairs Council, on 10 March. I refer the hon. Member to the statement made by my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Treasury in reply to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, East (Mr. Knowles), on 14 March.

Mr. Hamilton: How could the Foreign Secretary and his colleagues have underestimated Common Market spending by so much that a supplementary budget is necessary? Does the Minister not agree that Community spending is now out of control? What about the budget discipline that we have heard so much about?

Mrs. Chalker: It is not that Community spending is out of control, unless certain nations, and that excludes this country, press for unrealistic agriculture budgets. What the Commission will be proposing in a supplementary budget this year will be a provision of about 450 mecu. to increase our 1985 abatement. It has also said that it will propose a supplementary provision for agriculture, which arises from the fall in the dollar-ecu rate. In our view, the correct response should be to seek savings in the agriculture budget and in that way reduce the surplus. We should then be in a far better position not to require such a repetition of events.

African National Congress

17. Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he expects the next meeting to take place between his officials and members of the African National Congress; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: As foreshadowed to the House on 5 March, contacts between officials and the ANC are continuing as appropriate. The central purpose of such contact is to bring home to the ANC the importance of a suspension of violence on all sides in South Africa in order to promote constructive dialogue. We have not agreed to any ministerial contact.

Mr. Adley: I welcome the decision of my right hon. and learned Friend's officials to meet the ANC. Can he confirm that the eminent persons group has also had meetings with the ANC? As the ANC represents the views of the large majority of non-white people in South Africa, notwithstanding the propaganda put out to the contrary by the South African Government, will my right hon. and learned Friend ensure that as much conversation and dialogue as possible take place so that we can try to find a solution in South Africa by peaceful means and avoid the violent means that will be inevitable if that is not achieved?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The Commonwealth eminent persons group met a wide range of people both inside and outside South Africa, including, of course, representatives or members of the ANC. That contact has been provided for because of the role that they occupy, or could occupy.

Argentina

18. Mr. Willie W. Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will now seek to re-establish diplomatic relations with Argentina; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: As my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary said to the hon. Member for Kilmarnock and Loudoun (Mr. McKelvey) on 5 March, we wish to move towards more normal relations with Argentina. We have taken numerous steps to achieve this; the Argentine Government have still to respond constructively.

Mr. Hamilton: Is the Minister aware that there has been a rapid erosion of international support for the Government's inflexible policy, which is, in the meantime, costing the hard-pressed British taxpayers hundreds of millions of pounds every year? Does he not realise that every other party in the House is committed to ending that absurd policy straight after the next election? In those circumstances, will he do more to protect the interests of British taxpayers?

Mr. Eggar: The majority of the cost is behind us now, as expenditure on Mount Pleasant airport has decreased. But is the hon. Gentleman really saying that all other parties are prepared to pay no attention to the Falklanders' right of self-determination?

Sir Frederic Bennett: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Does it arise from questions?

Sir Frederic Bennett: Yes, Sir.

Mr. Speaker: Then I will take it.

Sir Frederic Bennett: I wish to raise a brief and entirely non-partisan point of order, which I think will be of interest to hon. Members on both sides of the House. In reply to question 3, concerning another country's citizens receiving military training in Britain, the Minister gave a full answer and an exchange followed between hon. Members on both sides of the House, about which no one can complain. But when, in a supplementary question, I asked whether similar information——

Mr. Speaker: Order. Points of order must interest me.

Sir Frederic Bennett: They will, or at least I hope they will. When I then asked whether similar questions could be answered about other countries, I was told that the answer was no, because such arrangements were confidential as between the countries concerned——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am afraid that that is not my responsibility.

Ownership of the Media

3.32 pm

Mr. Tony Lloyd (Stretford): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to restrict the shareholdings of non-United Kingdom individuals and companies in all newspaper, television and radio companies operating in the United Kingdom, and to place controls on the transfer of shareholdings in such companies.

It is inevitable that recent events at Wapping should have concentrated the public's mind on the unaccountability and gross unacceptability of the conduct of Rupert Murdoch as a newspaper proprietor. I think that even Conservative Members will freely acknowledge that Rupert Murdoch's contribution has not raised the standards of British journalism. His main contribution has been to introduce "page three" into our language, so perhaps we should not entrust to him the destiny of the British press.

Mr. Derek Fatchett (Leeds, Central): He has even given gutters a bad name.

Mr. Lloyd: As my hon. Friend says, he has even given gutters a bad name. Yet, surprisingly, we are apparently free and happy to allow him to expand his interests throughout not only the press, but the media generally.

The purpose of the Bill is to examine the problem of concentration in the newspaper industry and, more generally, in radio and television. Our media industry is one of the most concentrated in the world. Eight companies or individuals control virtually the whole of the national daily and Sunday press. Fourteen out of 16 independent television companies are individually controlled by 16 or fewer shareholders and, where full details are easily available of the 41 independent local radio contractors, all but one are controlled by fewer than 10 shareholders. There is a massive concentration, even at company level. To make matters worse, many of the shareholders are shareholders of other organisations, so that Rupert Murdoch not only controls News International, but is a significant shareholder in London Weekend Television.

The Mirror Group of Newspapers, for example, which controls the second largest slice of the British press, is a significant shareholder in Central Television. United Newspapers, the present owners of the Express stable, have significant shareholdings in Tyne-Tees, Yorkshire Television, Harlech Television, and TV-am. To make matters worse, what would seem highly improbable to someone entering Britain for the first time is that we exercise no control over where this ownership comes from. Thus, specifically 54 per cent. of the circulation of the national papers is in the hands of what are ultimately foreign-based companies.

We all know that recently, as an illustration of great patriotism, Murdock renounced his Australian citizenship in order to embrace his new love—the United States. Yet at no time has there been any need for Murdock to offer any allegiance to or care for this country in which he has such significant media holdings. It has been said that the same situation applies to a lesser extent to the Liechtenstein-based company which ultimately owns the Mirror Group of Newspapers.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East): A Labour Member of Parliament.

Mr. Lloyd: The hon. Gentleman seems to be under the impression that the proprietors of the Mirror Group of Newspapers are Labour Members of Parliament. Clearly he is as confused in his knowledge of the press as he is in most other areas.

Similar problems of concentration of ownership arise in the context of television and radio broadcasting. When the Rank Organisation recently made a well-publicised attempt to take over Granada Television, a statement by Rank at the time claimed that the combination of these two companies would be in the commercial interests of both. Yet at no stage was any mention made of an attempt to maintain journalistic standards or to protect the right of the public to have an acceptable quality of television output.

Those factors simply did not figure in the reasons why the Rank Organisation launched that attempted takeover. Nor did they figure in Ladbroke's consideration of a merger with Granada. Fortunately, in the Rank case the Independent Broadcasting Authority decided that the takeover was unacceptable and ruled that it could not go ahead, and it did not go ahead. It may be thought, therefore, that the IBA has the power to stop the predatory activity of organisations in relation to radio and television companies, but that simply is not the case, because the logic that debarred the Rank Organisation from taking over Granada Television did not stop the Granada group of companies from having television broadcasting as a minor part of its activities, so that it accounts for less than 20 per cent. of Granada's annual turnover. Thus, television is not a significant part of Granada's corporate plan.

It is not surprising that the chairman of Rank said that it would be inequitable if action by the IBA was to obstruct Granada shareholders from benefiting from a Rank takeover. I have considerable sympathy for the Rank Organisation, not because the takeover was right but because it seems very peculiar that a takeover by one conglomerate should not be acceptable while another conglomerate can operate in much the same way. Of course, overseas it is common practice for there to be restrictions on the rights of transfer of shareholdings in the press and in television and radio companies. For example, we know that Rupert Murdoch's motivation in becoming an American citizen was dictated not by any great love of Ronald Reagan—and I sympathise with that—but purely because American laws dictated that he could not be the owner of significant holdings in television companies if he were not a United States citizen. Ironically, because he had to take out American citizenship and renounce his Australian citizenship, Mr. Murdoch has now been forced by Australian laws to give up some holdings in Australian television companies.

What the Bills seeks to do is simple. It seeks to prevent non-United Kingdom residents from having significant shareholdings in companies which operate press, television or radio organisations and limits the size of indvidual shareholdings to prevent unacceptable behaviour such as that which we have witnessed from Eddie Shah and Rupert Murdoch, and which we have increasingly witnessed from directors whose only interest is economic and has nothing to do with the maintenance of standards. I am sure that the Bill will commend itself to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Tony Lloyd, Mrs. Ann Clwyd, Mr. Derek Fatchett, Mr. Sean Hughes, Mr. Terry Lewis, and Mr. Ken Eastham.

OWNERSHIP OF THE MEDIA

Mr. Tony Lloyd accordingly presented a Bill to restrict the shareholdings and radio companies operating in the United Kingdom, and to place controls on the transfer of shareholdings in such companies: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 11 April and to be printed. [Bill 128.]

Airports Bill

Mr. Speaker: Yesterday the right hon. Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe (Mr. Morris) asked for my ruling on whether the altered status of Manchester international airport rendered the Airports Bill prima facie hybrid.

I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for giving me oral notice of this matter yesterday and for sending me a detailed written submission because it has enabled me to look into the matter in great detail and to reach a considered decision.

The right hon. Gentleman submitted that the newly constituted Manchester airport company, created on 1 April after the Bill was reported from Standing Committee, is being singled out from other airports in its class and that the Bill is therefore hybrid. My duty is to look at the terms of the Bill and to see whether it singles out an airport or airport company for treatment different from others in the same class.

When I look at this Bill, I see that the classes of the airports, airports companies and local authorities are drawn entirely in general terms, and that there is no discrimination within those classes. The changed status of Manchester international airport has therefore not made the Airports Bill a hybrid Bill.

Mr. Alfred Morris (Manchester, Wythenshawe): I am grateful to you, Mr. Speaker, for the earnest consideration which I know that you have given to my application. With others on both sides of the House, I shall naturally want to reflect on a very important statement. Meanwhile, may I thank the Officers of the House with whom I have been in contact on this matter for their unfailing help and courtesy?

Mr. Speaker: I thank the right hon. Gentleman.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I am sorry to raise this matter, but you will know that one and a quarter hours were spent yesterday on a series of points of order. I want not to repeat what was said yesterday but to raise with you a question which relates to yesterday.

You will know, Mr. Speaker, that the argument was that hon. Members had been led to believe that certain documents would be made available before the debate. The Chair ruled repeatedly that that was a matter for Ministers. When the House is being disrupted and its proceedings are being delayed, as was the case yesterday, would you not wish to express a view which might influence Ministers' judgments when they are deciding when to make documents available?

My hon. Friend the Member for Dunfermline, West (Mr. Douglas) came into the Chamber with an enormous pile of documents which had been put in the Library at 3.30 pm—approximately half an hour before the debate. It was clear that no hon. Member was able to discuss or examine those documents or to examine relevant issues about which there was information in the documents. May I put it to you, Mr. Speaker, that you might wish to deprecate the practice of Ministers refusing to allow sufficient time to enable hon. Members to study such material? Such information, had it been available, would have had some bearing on yesterday's debate.

Mr. Speaker: I thank the hon. Gentleman. I confirm that Mr. Deputy Speaker was in the Chair at the time and was correct in what he said. When documents are made available is a matter for the Government, not for the Chair. I note also that Mr. Deputy Speaker allowed a dilatory motion to be moved, so the decision was placed in the hands of the House.

Orders of the Day

Airports Bill

As amended (in the Standing Committee), considered.

New Clause 1

COMPENSATION FOR LOSS OR DIMINUTION OF PENSION RIGHTS

'(1) The Secretary of State may provide by regulations for the payment, by such persons as may be prescribed by or determined under the regulations, in such cases and to such extent as may be so prescribed or determined, of pensions, allowances or gratuities by way of compensation to or in respect of persons who have suffered loss or diminution of pension rights by reason of—

(a) any transfer of property, rights and liabilies under section 14(7), or

(b) the disposal under section 19(2) of any interests held by a principal council in a public airport company.

(2) Regulations under this section may—

(a) include provision as to the manner in which and the persons to whom any claim for compensation is to be made, and for the determination of all questions arising under the regulations;

(b) make or authorise the Secretary of State to make exceptions and conditions in relation to any classes of persons or any circumstances to which the regulations apply; and

(c) be framed so as to have effect from a date earlier than the making of the regulations;

but regulations having effect from a date earlier than their making shall not place any individual who is qualified to participate in the benefits for which the regulations provide in a worse position than he would have been if the regulations had been framed so as to have effect only from the date of their making.

(3) Regulations under this section may include either or both of the following provisions, namely—

(a) provision authorising the payment, without probate (or, in Scotland, confirmation) and without other proof of title, of any sum due under the regulations in respect of a person who has died to his personal representatives or such other persons as may be described by the regulations; and

(b) provision rendering void any assignment of (or, in Scotland, assignation of) or charge on, or any agreement to assign or charge, any benefit under the regulations, and provision that on the bankruptcy of a person entitled to such a benefit (or, in Scotland, sequestration of the estate of, or granting of a trust deed for creditors by, such a person) no part of it shall pass to any trustee or other person acting on behalf of the creditors, except in accordance with an order made by a court in pursuance of any enactment specified in the regulations.

(4) Subject to subsection (5), where regulations under this section have made provision for the payment of pensions, allowances or gratuities as mentioned in subsection (1), compensation in respect of any such loss or diminution of pension rights as is mentioned in that subsection shall be paid only in accordance with those regulations in any case to which those regulations apply; and accordingly such compensation shall not be paid under any other statutory provision, by virtue of any provision in a contract or otherwise.

(5) Subsection (4) shall not prevent the payment of any sum to which a person is entitled by virtue of contractual rights acquired by him before such date as the Secretary of State may by order specify.

(6) Any regulations or order made under this section by the Secretary of State may make different provision for different cases to which those regulations or that order apply or applies, as the case may be, and may in particular make different provision as respects different areas.

(7) In this section—

"pension", in relation to a person, means a pension, whether contributory or not, of any kind whatsoever payable to or in respect of him, and includes—

(a) a gratuity so payable;

(b) a return of contributions to a pension fund, with or without interest on or any other addition to those contributions; and

(c) any sums payable on or in respect of the death of that person;

"pension rights" includes, in relation to any person, all forms of right to or eligibility for the present or future payment of a pension, and any expectation of the accruer of a pension under any customary practice, and includes a right of allocation in respect of the present or future payment of a pension.'.—[Mr. Ridley.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

3.47 pm

The Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Nicholas Ridley): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to take the following:

New clause 4—Superannuation and pension rights—

'(1) No change shall be made to the structure, provisions or coverage of the BAA superannuation scheme without the agreement of those presently recognised trade unions who are members of the BAA Central Negotiating Committee.

(2) No scheme providing for the transfer to a company of the business of operating a local authority undertaking or any activities incidental to or connected with carrying on that business shall be approved by the Secretary of State unless it provides for the establishment by the principal council of a body to administer the pension funds of such a company.'.

New clause 5—Pay and conditions—

'(1) Neither the company to which the rights, property and liabilities of BAA are transferred nor any of its subsidiaries may introduce into the national agreements now in force with the central trade unions any term less favourable than the current terms, nor may they in any respect worsen the pay and conditions of service now obtaining for BAA employees without the agreement of all the presently recognised central trade unions.

(2) The Secretary of State shall not approve any scheme for the creation of a company to carry on the business of operating a local authority airport or any activities incidental to or connected with carrying on that business, unless that scheme provides for any existing employees of a council to be transferred to the company upon terms of employment no less favourable to them than those under which they are employed immediately prior to such transfer.'.

Government amendment No. 64.

Mr. Ridley: On 4 March during the debate in Standing Committee, at column 384 of the Official Report I said that two options were open to public airport companies in respect of their employees' pensions. Staff transferred to the airport company may, under subordinate legislation, be deemed to remain employees of the local authority concerned while that company remains in the ownership of the parent authority. That is known as the deeming option. Alternatively, the company may negotiate continuing membership of the local government superannuation scheme while the local authority continues to own most of it. That is the admission agreement option. Under either option, nothing changes for the employees as their pension rights continue under the local government superannuation scheme.

The hon. Member for Aberdeen, North (Mr. Hughes) had some doubts about pension rights transfer, as evidenced by his proposed amendment in Committee. I undertook to see whether further measures were needed to safeguard the interests of transferred employees' pensions.

The deeming option or admission agreement option would, of course, have to be negotiated by the company and the parent authority. Although I am certain that the two parties could reach an agreement in every case, I must accept that it is just possible that an airport company finding the going difficult might seek a cheaper scheme and try to economise by leaving the local authority scheme. To cover that possibility — remote though it may be — I am pleased to introduce the new clause, which is modelled closely on section 84 of the Transport Act 1985 together with its associated consequential amendment, which provides the powers necessary for me to make regulations providing for compensation to be paid to public airport company employees who suffer loss or diminution of pension rights. I hope not to have to use the powers, but I assure the House that I will not hesitate to do so if necessary.

The hon. Member for Aberdeen, North returns to that point in new clause 4 and has a slightly wider point in new clause 5. It might be convenient if I responded to his arguments on those new clauses when I have heard them. I warn him in advance that we believe that the new clause 4 is unnecessary and that new clause 5 might be undesirable.

Mr. Robert Hughes (Aberdeen, North): I am grateful to the Minister for his few remarks at the beginning of this debate. Especially in view of his final comments on new clauses 4 and 5, it might be convenient if I said now that, at the appropriate time, I shall request separate Divisions on new clauses 4 and 5 unless—which is unlikely—my eloquence persuades the Minister to accept both.

New clause 1 is welcome in that it recognises that a problem could arise for existing employees should a privatised company or a public limited company formerly in the direct ownership and control of local authorities move towards a pension or superannuation scheme which is less beneficial to employees than that which they currently enjoy.

New clause 1 is merely an enabling measure and is hedged about with all sorts of conditions. It is no more than a grace-and-favour clause and I for one have no faith that the Secretary of State will approach the issue with sufficient resolution and determination to ensure that justice is done.

We all have the benefit of the record to go by. We know, for example, that the 15,000 staff of the National Bus Company lost their guarantee to index-linked pensions as a result of the Transport Act 1985. New clause 1 goes in a direction that is dramatically opposite to the policy which would protect employees by having their pension rights guaranteed. The only thing that is guaranteed under the Secretary of State's policy is that in the drive and thrust for profit the well-being of employees will take second place.

The philosophy of the Secretary of State is the true philosophy of the Conservative party. He is open about this and has made it clear that he will have no truck with the benevolent face that the Government are seeking to show to the public, which is the face of caring capitalism. He is so proud of the fact that he states his opposition to such an approach on every possible occasion. At the same time other Ministers are trying busily to sell to the public a policy that suggests that private pension schemes provide the best answer to the problem of pension provision in future. Other Ministers are encouraging the public to make their own private pension arrangements. However, schemes have been built up over decades that have been negotiated between employees and employers and we must retain the better schemes by ensuring that they are enshrined in statute. The best that the Secretary of State can offer in new clause 1 is that if he happens to be in a generous mood he might provide for some compensation. It is clear that it is an enabling provision because it does not say that the Secretary of State shall do anything.

There is nothing in the Bill and nothing in new clause 1 which provides a modicum of protection for British Airports Authority employees.

Mr. Robert Litherland (Manchester, Central): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I crave your indulgence. I have had time to reflect on your ruling on the hybridity of the Bill, which was the issue raised by my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe (Mr. Morris). I think that it would be helpful if your statement could be made available to all who wish to participate in the debate.

Mr. Speaker: Every hon. Member who was present in the Chamber will have heard my statement, and it will certainly appear in Hansard.

Mr. Hughes: I was saying that British Airports Authority employees will not have a modicum of protection for their pension arrangements. We have had the experience of previous privatisation legislation and we know that publicly owned companies have taken on the shadowy form of being neither one thing nor the other. These companies have been privatised but we know that they are in the ownership of the Secretary of State. We know also that British Airways changed its pension scheme considerably. It managed to do so by offering financial inducements to existing employees to transfer to the new and less favourable scheme. That does not detract from the argument I am advancing.

New clause 5 seeks to ensure that unions that are involved in the British Airports Authority's central negotiating committee must be consulted about any changes that are suggested to the pension scheme and provides that no change can be made without their agreement. On the local government side, new clause 4 provides that a body should be set up to administer the pension fund of such a company. I anticipate that trade union involvement would be allowed for in this instance.

I turn to pay and conditions, which come within new clause 5, and I shall comment briefly on the background to the costs that are involved in manning and running airports. We know that employee and staff wages in the British Airports Authority are currently the biggest items of expenditure. We also know that the profits generated within the BAA come not from the airport handling but from duty-free and other concessions at Heathrow and Gatwick. Of course, other airports are not in the same position. They do not have access to the throughput of passengers which makes the duty-free and other concessions a major factor in bringing in income.

Over the whole picture it seems clear that pay and conditions of service will be under attack in the efforts to cut costs. In other words, the success of privatisation will be at the expense of workers in the industry who have done so much to make the BAA the successful publicly owned company that it is now. We believe that workers have a strong right to protection of wages and conditions that have been obtained by many patient years of negotiations. We now fear that all that is under threat and that there may well be moves to decentralise wage bargaining, currently done centrally. We believe that the move will be towards individual negotiations with airport staff at individual airports, notwithstanding the fact that it is currently the BAA's policy to call upon its employees to work at any of the BAA airports.

We also know that the British Airports Authority management has told the workers that their job rights are guaranteed for 12 months after privatisation. After that, the future is extremely murky. It is being said in many quarters that there is no need to worry because the airline business is likely to expand and that with it the policy, programme income and so on generated at airports are also likely to expand.

No one can forecast with any certainty what will happen in the future. There are stories of many of the international airlines being in difficulty and there is some doubt whether the traffic will grow to the extent forecast. Although the argument is that the present work force has no fears for the future, that is not the case. I believe that attempts will be made to contract out services which are currently done in-house in an attempt to drive down costs and weaken the bargaining position of trade unions.

The Government's position is quite clear and they have never hidden it. They believe that market forces will take care of all those things—pay, conditions and pensions. They believe that those are issues in which the Government should not seek to interfere. I believe that the Government's policy exposes their claim that they are not anti-trade union as sham and hollow. It is a contradiction for them then to say that they favour responsible trade unions, proper negotiating procedures and that they want to encourage unions to undertake proper and sensible bargaining positions. The trade unions currently employed within the BAA and those employed within local authorities have been extremely responsible. They have bargained sensibly and achieved reasonable pay and conditions. It is sad that, once the airports are privatised, there will be nothing to protect them from the ravages of Government policy and there is nothing in the Bill that will do that.

We believe that trade unions should be encouraged. We believe that pay and conditions should be protected. The Government clearly do not. New clauses 4 and 5 seek to erect a barrier against predatory companies which may not have the welfare of employees at heart. The clauses will give a guarantee against the damaging change by encouraging negotiations. For those reasons, we shall seek to write new clauses 4 and 5 into the Bill.

Mr. Ridley: The hon. Gentleman has now advanced the argument for new clauses 4 and 5, and I shall respond to it. He said that the Transport Act 1985 had deprived the busmen of the guarantee of their pension schemes. With respect—I mention this only because it is relevant to the new clauses—that is not the case, because there was never a guarantee of the National Bus Company pension funds. There is not a guarantee of the BAA's pension fund as at present constituted, nor is there a guarantee of any nationalised industry pension fund or of the pension fund of any industry which has been privatised. Therefore, we are treating all those pension fund problems on a par with one another. There has been no precedent for a guarantee of a privatised company's pension fund. In fact, the British Airports Authority provides a generous pension scheme for its employees. Pensions are index-linked and amount to two thirds of pensionable pay on retirement for an employee with 36 years' service.

Far from being under threat from privatisation, as the hon. Member for Aberdeen, North (Mr. Hughes) said, after consulting my Department the chairman of the BAA wrote to all the employees on 16 August last year making it clear that the pension rights of the BAA's existing staff and pensioners would remain unaltered as a result of privatisation. The scheme is managed by a board of trustees, which comprises three representatives each from the staff and management sides, plus a chairman. Proposals for amending the scheme are discussed fully at joint meetings of management and work force. The BAA has shown in the past that it is ready to listen to its employees' views, as any good employer should.

Like any private sector company, the BAA must retain the freedom to manage its own affairs, but I am sure that it will continue to do so in full consultation with its work force. It would be wrong to write in, as new clause 4 seeks to do, some sort of guarantee on that matter.

I refer to local authority airports' pension funds. Under new clause 4, a large number of comparatively small pension funds would be set up by local authorities which own airports, for those airports' employees. With respect, there is no difference in quality between that and the proposals in new clause 1. Employees of local authority airport companies should be able to join , or stay in local government superannuation schemes, by one means or another. Indeed, the hon. Gentleman's proposal is less acceptable than mine because it would mean a multiplication of small pension funds administered by bodies without experience.

New clause 5 would impose upon the BAA's successor company and its subsidiaries requirements that would exceed those placed on any other private sector company, or, for that matter, on any employers in the public sector. The agreement of all recognised unions would be required before the introduction of any change in employees' terms and conditions which might include some element that was unfavourable to the unions' members. There is no reason to put that group of people in a privileged position compared with the rest of the work force — that of having statutory protection against changes in their terms of employment additional to that for other employees under existing statutes. For example, they will have, as other employees have, the protection of the Employment Protection (Consolidation Act) 1978, which protects them against any unilateral change in their terms of employment which amounts to constructive unfair dismissal.

The pay of the BAA's employees after privatisation will be a matter for negotiation between employees and management, and I am sure that the hon. Gentleman would not have it any different, or he would not believe in collective bargaining, as he often professes he does. It would be wrong to fetter that process as the new clause proposes.

The second part of new clause 5 is unnecessary. In our view, each transfer of staff to an airport company under a scheme approved by the Secretary of State will be a relevant transfer under the Transfer of Undertakings (Protection of Employment) Regulations 1981. That means that the staff concerned will become employees on the terms and conditions under their contract with the relevant local authority immediately prior to transfer. In other words, their contracts should then be read as if they had been made with the company rather than with the authority. I am sure hon. Members will agree with me that that is an extremely satisfactory position and that it renders any other provision unnecessary.

Far from accepting the jibes of the hon. Member for Aberdeen, North that we are not looking after the pensions or conditions of the staff of either the BAA or the local authority airports, I believe that I have demonstrated that, with new clause 1 and the present statutory position, every precaution has been taken to secure what is right and proper in an economy where there is still room for collective bargaining over all those matters. I suggest to the House that we accept new clause 1 and the consequent amendment, and reject new clauses 4 and 5.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): I should like the Secretary of State to clarify something for me.

It has been put to me by trade union representatives at Edinburgh airport that their members might be disadvantaged, given traffic forecasts for forthcoming years, by accepting the proposed arrangements. After what the right hon. Gentleman has just said, am I entitled to go back to those representatives of the staff at the airport and assure them that he has given an undertaking to the Commons that they will not be so disadvantaged following the transfer?

Mr. Ridley: In response to the hon. Gentleman's question, I am not clear in what sense the employees of Edinburgh airport are suggesting that they might be disadvantaged. There is no possibility of their being disadvantaged in respect of their pension rights, compared with what would happen if they stayed in the public sector in the local authority scheme.

Mr. George Park (Coventry, North-East): As I understand it, the object of the Bill is to privatise the airports and, in so doing, make them more efficient. When I read the Bill I was surprised to find that there is nothing in it which refers to probably the most vital part of the prosperity and efficiency of any undertaking, whether public or private — that is, matters connected with the work force. That is particularly relevant in this case because most of the cost of running an airport is in the wages and salaries paid to the employees. Therefore, I was surprised that there was no mention of that. That is why we have felt it necessary to table new clauses 4 and 5.

It is undoubtedly true that there is a feeling of insecurity among the employees at the airports. They are not sure how they will fare with privatisation. The experience of privatisations in other industries does not give them much confidence. I am sure that they would prefer to see something in writing rather than accept the bland assurances of the Secretary of State and then find the whole thing blowing up in their face.

Therefore, new clause 4 sets down in writing the reference to "recognised trade unions who are members of the BAA Central Negotiating Committee."

Under the new clause, the unions will continue to function and to have a say in agreements that they have built up over a long time and that they wish to maintain. The new clause does not seek to add anything; it seeks merely to protect the current position.

The same applies to new clause 5, which refers to pay and conditions being no "less favourable than the current terms".

Therefore, in new clauses 4 and 5 we are not trying to raise the ante, to try to gain some advantage for the employees in the interim period. What is absolutely essential is that something should be written into the Bill, as is proposed by new clauses 4 and 5, giving a firm assurance and a sense of security to the current employees. That would undoubtedly help to maintain and improve the efficiency of the airports.

I am surprised that the Secretary of State cannot see the matter in this light. It is not good enough to brush it to one side and say that what we propose is unnecessary. The Secretary of State said that, if required, he would step in, but he has not been all that smart in jumping in on other situations when employees were extremely worried about their pay and conditions.

These new clauses are an attempt to introduce a modicum of security for employees. They will enable employees to feel that, under privatisation, they will have a future for themselves and their families. All that we are seeking to do is to make it clear to employees that that is the intention of the Opposition, whether or not it is the intention of the Government.

Mr. David Lambie (Cunninghame, South): If the Bill becomes an Act, I am interested, as a Scottish Member, in the fact that the four major airports in Scotland will be controlled by the new BAA company and that the rest of the airports of the Highlands and Islands will be controlled by the CAA.

I have listened to the assurances of the Secretary of State that the workers of the privatised BAA will not be disadvantaged compared with the workers in other similar privatised schemes. Can the right hon. Gentleman tell me whether superannuation pensions and conditions of work will be the same for the workers of the Highlands and Islands airports as those for the workers in the four Scottish airports which will be under the control of the BAA?

We have been given assurances from Sir Norman Payne and the present management of the BAA about what will happen when the newly privatised set-up takes over. However, Sir Norman will not continue indefinitely at the BAA. I am therefore concerned about the future.

There are provisions in the Bill to allow foreign people to buy control of BAA. Therefore, the outlook of the new management could be entirely different. We may get the American or Australian type of management which we are witnessing in the printing industry. Such foreign control will not be prevented unless some of our proposals are carried today.

As a Scottish Member, I am always concerned if we allow negotiations on pension rights and wages and conditions to develop separately in Scotland from England. In the south of England, especially around the London airports, there is high employment. In Scotland, with the exception of Aberdeen airport, the areas surrounding the airports have high unemployment. In areas of high unemployment, the management may say to workers that they are lucky to be working and that they are not like their colleagues who are unemployed. In fact, their colleagues are not just unemployed but are now long-term unemployed, having been without a job for a year or two years or more. The management could therefore tell the workers that they should be happy to accept a standstill in wages, or indeed a reduction in wages, which has been forced on the workers in some companies in my own constituency. The management may say, "Why worry about decent pensions? You are lucky to be working".

I should like an assurance from the Secretary of State that the pension conditions and the conditions of service of the workers in the privatised BAA, whether at Prestwick, Glasgow or the London airports, will be identical. For that reason, we must continue with central negotiation. There must be central control of the pension schemes and conditions of service. I accept the assurances given by the Secretary of State, but, just as Sir Norman Payne may not be part of the new privatised BAA, the Secretary of State's future in the Government is even more insecure.

Mr. Peter Snape (West Bromwich, East): Tenuous.

Mr. Lambie: We have accepted the assurances of Ministers and Under-Secretaries in Committee and on Report, but often when we go home and listen to the television news we discover that the Minister has been replaced. The former Minister can then say that he did not given any assurances.

I ask the Secretary of State to give me an assurance that the conditions of the present workers in the CAA will be identical to those of the workers in the BAA. Will central negotiation be continued to ensure that wages and pension rights in the Scottish airports are identical to those in the London airports?

Mr. Ridley: I shall answer briefly, as I think it is wrong for me to have intervened three times already in the debate. I should clear up what I said to the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell).

The substance of my reply was correct, that the pensions of the BAA employees are protected. It momentarily slipped my mind that Edinburgh airport is not a local authority airport but a BAA airport. What I said about the pensions of BAA employees applies to the earlier speech that I made on the subject. The pensions of the employees will be as safeguarded in the future as they are at present — indeed, as all other pension funds have been.

The hon. Member for Coventry, North-East (Mr. Park) and, to some extent, the hon. Member for Cunninghame, South (Mr. Lambie) have asked the Government to write into statute some form of guarantee about the wages and conditions of airport workers. I am sure that, on reflection, they will believe that we should not do that. It has not been done for any other group of workers in any other industry. If we were to embark on the course of writing into statute what the wages and pensions should be, not only would we frustrate collective bargaining but there would be fixed wages and conditions for all time without any possibility of future improvement.

I cannot give the hon. Member for Cunninghame, South an undertaking that the wages, terms and conditions and pensions of those who work for the CAA airports, the BAA airports, and local authority airports will necessarily be the same or will be underwritten by statute. Wages can vary between different employers, different parts of the country and different industries. To deny the possibility of wages varying would be to deny to some people the possibility of improving their standard of living. I am sure that that is not what the hon. Gentleman wants, and that is not what we want. We should leave it to the market to determine wages.

Mr. Robert Hughes: With the leave of the House.

I do not think I have heard such a specious argument in the 15½ years that I have been a Member of the House. To argue that the new clauses, which seek to guarantee existing pay and conditions, are an infringement of bargaining rights is complete nonsense.

The Secretary of State is saying that the employer should have the right to bargain wages down but that employees or trade unions should not have the right to bargain wages up. There is nothing in the new clauses which says that the present pay and conditions are to be frozen for all time. We would encourage the growth of the airport business and hope that there would be opportunities for better pay and conditions. That is not the problem. I am satisfied that an attempt will be made to drive wages down. The new owners of the BAA will have in mind what the Chancellor said during his Budget speech.

If the Secretary of State gets his way, local authority airports will not remain in local authority ownership for all time. If the Bill has any effect, an attempt will be made to move local authority-controlled airports into a second stage—the private sector.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer constantly bemoans, as every Minister does, the level of wages in industry generally. Indeed, he has gone so far as to say that high wage levels are the Achilles heel of the British economy. If that is not an invitation, encouragement, or even a direction for those in private industry to seek to drive down wages, I do not know what is.

There is a clear division between us. We want to see pay, conditions and pensions, which have been negotiated by responsible trade unions with responsible employers, kept as they are with no possibility of their being downgraded.

The Secretary of State says that that has never been done for any company or industry which has been privatised or for any public industries. The fact that it is novel does not mean that it is wrong. It does not put workers in a privileged position. It gives them rights which they should enjoy. The guarantees that the Secretary of State gives about the BAA and local authority ownership apply only so long as they are not private companies and in the market place. The right hon. Gentleman is well known as an advocate of market forces. We know that he dislikes the present level of pay and conditions, and part of the objective would be to try to drive those down.

I shall not ask my right hon. and hon. Friends to vote against new clause 1. It is a concession. It is a recognition that what we are saying might well happen. The fact that the Secretary of State is taking the power to provide for compensation shows that he recognises that that could be a reality. Therefore, I accept new clause 1, but I shall seek to divide the House on new clause 4.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause read a Second time, and added to the Bill.

New Clause 3

RESTRICTIONS ON SHARE OWNERSHIP

'From the date of enactment of this Act, the following restrictions on purchase and ownership shall apply to the company to which the property, rights and liability of the BAA are transferred, to that company's subsidiaries, and to any company formed by a principal council to carry on the business of a local authority airport undertaking or any activities incidental to or connected with carrying on that business:

(a) no foreign company shall be eligible to purchase or own shares;

(b) no airline operator shall be eligible to purchase or own shares;

(c) no individual shareholder, organisation or company shall be eligible to purchase or own more than 2 per cent. of the total shares.'—[Mr. Snape.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Snape: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take new clause 11—Airline share ownership by foreign governments or corporations—

'(1) Notwithstanding any provision to the contrary, the directors of the successor company shall be entitled to refuse to register the transfer of any shares in the successor company if

(i) at any time within five years from the date upon which the successor company ceases to be wholly owned by the Crown the total number of shares held by any person in the successor company would exceed fifteen per cent. of the total issued share capital of the successor company which carried the right to vote at general meetings.

(ii) the total number of such shares in the successor company held by airlines would exceed fifteen per cent. of the total issued share capital; or if the total number of such shares held by any one airline would exceed five per cent. of the total issued share capital.

(iii) any shares would be held by a foreign government of any corporation controlled either directly or indirectly by a foreign government, and the provisions of this section shall extend to any nominee acting for any person.

(2) For the purpose of this section "airline" shall mean an undertaking whose business includes the carriage by air of passengers or cargo for hire or reward and the holding company of any such airline if the business of the airline exceeds twenty per cent. of the turnover of the holding company in the financial year ending immediately prior to the date upon which the transfer of shares is presented for registration.

(3) The Directors shall be entitled to call upon any transferee of shares in the successor company to provide satisfactory proof that none of the limitations in subsection (1) would be exceeded before any share transfer is registered.'.

Mr. Snape: I should have thought that new clause 3, above any, would be guaranteed to strike a responsive chord among Conservative Members. As I am sure the hon. Member for Hertfordshire, South-West (Mr. Page) would agree, new clause 3 is about a healthy form of patriotism. The Conservative party always seeks to wrap itself in the flag of patriotism, no matter what issue we are talking about, and here they have an opportunity to vote for a new clause that is designed to protect, and aimed specifically at protecting, Britain's interests. The Opposition usually speak for Britain but the Government only talk about it while they are busy selling out. But here we give them an opportunity to make up for all the evil things that they have done for Britain over the past seven years by standing up and defending British interests. New clause 3 seeks to restrict foreign ownership of our airports for commercial as well as strategic reasons.

The House will be aware that the London airport system in particular is in active competition with the European airports of Amsterdam, Paris and Frankfurt, all of which have undertaken aggressive marketing campaigns and all of which are strongly supported by their Governments and national airlines. New clause 3 suggests that we in Britain should do the same, particularly for Heathrow. We should protect our interests in the future of our aviation industry. We invite the Conservative party to join us in going down that historic road.

Over the years, the BAA has been one of Britain's major foreign currency earners and has consistently reinvested its profits in new facilities that have brought widespread benefits to the British economy. We fear that if the new clause is not accepted and foreign operators decide to take a strategic stake in a privatised BAA, they could use that to stifle developments in London so as to enhance their own position. [Interruption.] I hope that the hon. Member for Hertfordshire, South-West, who is amusing his colleagues — although there is nothing particularly funny about what we are discussing — by reading a brief, a copy of which he has received, as I have too, will, when he comes to speak on new clause 11 which is linked with new clause 3, make the same points. If he likes, he can use his own words. I hope that he will accept that I do not need to concentrate exclusively on reading a brief to make a point in the House and if the hon. Gentleman wants to use his own words in supporting our position on new clause 3, we shall be delighted. He can carry some of his hon. Friends with him, especially the hon. Member for Lancaster (Mrs. Kellett-Bowman), whose dulcet tones frequently entertain the House. We do not doubt her patriotism for a moment. I know that she will be more than tempted to support this.

Mr. George Foulkes (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley): Strident tones.

Mr. Snape: Let us not be too ungallant. Dulcet tones will do. We shall expect to see the hon. Lady in the Opposition Lobby defending British interests, particularly on the day of a vital by-election, although the Airports Bill is unlikely to be a major topic of conversation in Fulham. But then we do not need any further topics because the argument is about who will be in second place.

I hope that the House will recognise the strategic importance of the major international asset that we have at Heathrow and will prevent unfriendly Governments, or perhaps merely competitive Governments, from interfering in Britain's key economic decisions in the aviation world.

I recently visited the west country. The importance of Britain's international air links to the provinces, to Plymouth and to areas such as my own in the west midlands, should be apparent to all hon. Members. It is obviously an attraction for companies that wish to invest in Britain if, by merely making one change at Heathrow, they can then fly on to areas such as Manchester, Birmingham or Plymouth. The benefit of that interlinking is enormous for the regional economy.

But let me caution the Conservative party on new clause 3. If it opposes it it should reflect that it may well be endangering interlinking through Heathrow airport and may be further endangering the economy of Britain's provinces, particularly if it allows foreign operators to take shares in a privatised BAA and then to use that influence, whether directly or indirectly, to reduce the number of slots at Heathrow which are available now to some of our smaller British airlines.

I know that one or two Conservative Members, for example the hon. Member for South Hams (Mr. Steen) who assiduously represents the interests of one smaller airline, would agree that we should do everything possible to prevent their interests being damaged. I hope that the hon. Member for South Hams will agree with me. I will not be cynical and say that the hon. Gentleman is paid to agree with me; I hope that I will be able to persuade him to agree with me that he acceptance of new clause 3 will safeguard the internal links though Heathrow that the company that the hon. Gentleman represents, and the provinces in general, greatly value. I hope that the hon. Gentleman and those of his hon. Friends who are concerned for the future of our air links to the provinces through Heathrow will support the new clause.

4.30 pm

The great argument—if one can dignify it by such a description—for privatisation is that it enables ordinary people to own great corporations and to share in their decision-making processes. I hope that I will be forgiven for some cynicism about that. Anyone who has watched the affairs of Westland in recent months will be aware that the view of the small shareholder is scarcely paramount. In new clause 3 we seek properly to write into legislation the theory that the Conservative party nominally embraces —the idea of a shareholding democracy.

We propose to limit individual shareholdings to a maximum of 2 per cent., and so to prevent some of the somewhat odious things that I have outlined coming to pass. A limit of 2 per cent. would genuinely lead to much greater participation by small shareholders in the affairs of a privatised BAA. Such a philosophy should endear it to Government Members, who still affect to believe in a shareholding democracy. That is what they say, but the reality is different. It is 40 years since a Member of a Labour Government stood at the Dispatch Box and said that the Tories only profess to believe in wider shareholding but that what they really believe in, and implement, is monopoly capitalism. That will be the likely outcome of this Bill. That has been the outcome of other privatisation exercises embarked upon by the Government, and that is what new clause 3 seeks to prevent. Conservative Members now have an opportunity to vote for what they have long talked about—genuine participation by small shareholders.

My hon. Friends and I have repeatedly stated our view throughout the discussion of this Bill. We oppose it in principle. However, it is our duty to try to improve any Bill put before the House as much as we can. We believe that new clause 3 would improve the Bill in a way designed to appeal to Conservative consciences, if such a phrase is not a contradiction in terms. If Conservative Members have any conscience left, they should surely support new clause 3.

I hesitate to preach the virtues of Conservatism too loudly—they are hard to find——

Mr. Frank Cook (Stockton, North): Another contradiction.

Mr. Snape: Indeed, but my hon. Friend should not be too upset about that. The art of politics for a minority party is to pitch its appeal in such a way that it may fall on receptive ears. That is what I have tried to do, and I commend new clause 3 to Conservative Back Benchers as heartily as I commend it to my hon. Friends.

Mr. Richard Page (Hertfordshire, South-West): I shall not follow precisely in the footsteps of the hon. Member for West Bromwich, East (Mr. Snape).

I wish to refer to new clause 11, which is grouped with new clause 3. I tabled new clause 11 because I feared that new clause 3 would be ruled out of order on the ground that it seems to be contrary to the edicts in the treaty of Rome. My clause, too, if not exactly breaching the treaty, would come hard up against it. It would certainly be against the spirit of the treaty. However, the clauses give me an opportunity to articulate my concern about possible pressures if there were to be a large shareholding in BAA, and the effect that such a large shareholding could have on the control and management of the newly privatised body.

The figures in new clause 3 are very tightly drawn. The figures in new clause 11 are a little more generous, but they are not intended to be definitive and they are certainly open to adaptation. Before developing the debate on the possible mechanism for providing fair protection that I believe could be added to the Bill, we should record the reasons why we feel such measures are necessary.

I apologise to the hon. member for West Bromwich, East for mildly twitting him about his points on the dangers of foreign ownership. I was worried that he might take all the points that I wanted to make, leaving me with very little to say.

Mr. Snape: I left half the brief for the hon. Gentleman. I knew that otherwise he would have nothing to say on new clause 11.

Mr. Page: And I really believed that I had persuaded the hon. Gentleman to chicken out. I did not realise that he was motivated more by generosity than by being ashamed of his own words.

I believe that airlines could form a group and have a major impact on shareholdings in the BAA. If four or five airlines each put in the equivalent of a jumbo jet, there would be a sizeable impact on the course of action that could be taken by the management. I do not say that they would act for sinister motives; they might have sensible commercial reasons. Nevertheless, there could be a knock-on effect on the fairness with which BAA was run. That could have an effect not only on new airlines wishing to come into the airport but on the consumer.

If I am worrying about a shadow, not a thing of substance, I am sure that my right hon. Friend will quickly tell me. My concern will then evaporate and new clause 11 will be allowed to lapse. However, if my right hon. Friend agrees that my anxiety is justified we must consider how to deal with it. I am not wedded to new clause 11 as the definitive solution to all our problems. It is a vehicle for discussion. Nevertheless, something should be done. I leave my right hon. Friend to consider whether we should use a new clause or merely amend the articles of association to provide some protection or limit. I shall listen with care to what he says about my genuine fears.

Mr. Litherland: I hope that the Government appreciate the common sense both of new clause 3 and of our observations about foreign control of airports. Surely the Government, and especially the Secretary of State, are aware of the vulnerability of airports throughout the world in view of the recent spate of terrorism. Almost daily we see on our television screens horrific scenes of terrorist activities at airports. That is true not only of the large international airports but of the provincial airports.

It was a sad day for Mancunians when police at our airport were first allocated guns. Obviously, the consequences of terrorism have exercised the minds of those responsible for airport security. I do not know how the arming of our airport police will affect the tourist trade. I am sure that it must affect the decisions of tourists to come to this country on holiday.

The numerous hijackings and planting of bombs on planes or in airports prove that airports are very vulnerable. Airports are of great local and national strategic value. That begs the question whether any unfriendly Government should have a large investment in any of our airport authorities. The safety and security of our airports must take priority, which lends force to the argument that there should not be any foreign ownership of shares in BAA or any other British airport authority.

Foreign ownership could put jobs at risk, because contracts could be awarded to foreign rather than to British companies at the expense of British jobs. Airports are key economic assets, so we should not undertake any action that would be detrimental to their viability and, therefore, not in the interests of the nation.

It could also be detrimental if airline operators held shares. For example, larger operators could set terms that were unacceptable to the smaller airlines, and that could lead to a carve-up at airports—[Interruption.] I said carve-up, but I mean a fiddle. Conservative Members should be used to that.

We are opposed to foreign companies owning shares in British airport authorities. They, together with airport operators, should be excluded from doing so. New clause 3 states:

"no individual shareholder, organisation or company shall be eligible to purchase or own more than 2 per cent. of the total shares."

My hon. Friend the Member for West Bromwich, East (Mr. Snape) said that that provision was common sense and met the criteria of Government dogma. I accept that we shall have no success in pleading with this Government to show reason. However, new clause 3 is a common-sense amendment in the British interest, and I hope that the House will accept it.

4.45 pm

Mr. James Couchman (Gillingham): I wish immediately to stress that, unlike the hon. Member for West Bromwich, East (Mr. Snape) — that unlikely national standard-bearer — I have no difficulty in speaking in favour of the Bill and the privatisation of the BAA.

Mr. Snape: What an overweight berk. [HON MEMBERS: "Oh!"] Well, the hon. Member for Gillingham (Mr. Couchman) is overweight, is he not? Perhaps he will tell the House why he considers me to be an unlikely standard-bearer. No doubt his military career was rather more glittering than mine, but I certainly left the services with an honourable discharge. What can he say about that?

Mr. Couchman: The hon. Gentleman is very touchy today. I do not think that my diet has very much to do with new clause 3. I stand absolutely four square behind the principle of the Bill, whereas the hon. Gentleman has declared his total opposition to it.

The Bill will enable the management of BAA plc to be free of the shackles of Whitehall and to bring about a prosperity to the airports that will——

Mr. Stephen Ross (Isle of Wight): In about a year's time, when BAA has been privatised, perhaps the hon. Gentleman will join me in looking at the salaries of the chairman and directors. I will have a bet with him that if those salaries have not doubled, they will certainly have increased by 50 per cent.

Mr. Couchman: If the salaries of the senior management and directors of BAA increase by that amount, I have no doubt that it will be because they have brought about a prosperity that currently is lacking. Their salaries would be linked to that.

I have no truck with new clause 3, which is clearly aimed at strangling any flotation of BAA. However, I am concerned about the possibility of foreign or airline control — a matter eloquently outlined by my hon. Friend the Member for Hertfordshire, South-West (Mr. Page). I am wholly in favour of people's capitalism—the current jargon—but it should be British people's capitalism. Because of the various ramifications of the treaty of Rome——

Mr. Ernie Ross (Dundee West): How many shares does the hon. Gentleman own?

Mr. Couchman: I have no shares at all.

We cannot legislate against the holding of shares in BAA by foreigners because that would be an infringement of the treaty of Rome. That is why new clause 3 is defective, as the Opposition must know by now. I hope that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will guarantee that control of BAA will remain in Britain, not just for a short period but for the indefinite future. I hope that he will assure us that steps will be taken, by the purchase or holding of a golden share, to ensure that control remains in Britain.

There is some parallel with other companies that have been privatised. I understand that 60 per cent. of the shareholding in Jaguar is now held in the United States. I do not know what that will mean for the control of Jaguar. I would not wish BAA to go down that path. British airports are public utilities and cannot really be compared with a manufacturing company such as Jaguar. The control of public utilities should remain within Britain for the indefinite future. I hope that my right hon. Friend can give the House that assurance.

Mr. Roger King (Birmingham, Northfield): After listening to some hon. Members, one would think that the Russian Aeroflot airline could gain control of Heathrow and turn it into a MIG base.

Mr. Snape: Why not?

Mr. King: I suppose that is a possibility, but only if the BAA, the Government and everyone else stand idly by and allow it to happen.

A privatised British airport system with a monopoly in the London area must carefully scrutinise those seeking ownership of the system. Unlike other privatised concerns, it does not have free-standing competitors—at least, not in the United Kingdom, although competition exists in the airports of Europe. For example, Heathrow and Gatwick face competition from Paris, Amsterdam and Frankfurt.

In theory, many of those airport organisations, through other airlines, could gain access to ownership of the British Airports Authority and use that ownership to ensure that certain policies which were beneficial to them were carried out. I do not, however, think that this would occur without the British Airports Authority knowing about it and taking steps to prevent it.

It could be done by using this clause, but an extraordinary amount of policing would be required to monitor 2 per cent. shareholdings, and the directors of the British Airports Authority would spend almost every moment of their working day trying to find out who owned the authority, leaving them very little time to run the organisation, in order to comply with the new clause.

Mr. Nicholas Fairbairn (Perth and Kinross): I pass through the airports of this country quite frequently and rarely find a servant of the authority who is Anglo-Saxon, or even a Scot. They all speak broken English. If the present monopoly is able to employ almost exclusively those who are not of British extraction, what is the problem?

Mr. King: I thank my hon. and learned Friend for that contribution. I would prefer to leave the question unanswered, except to say that I have noticed that the management side could perhaps benefit from some contribution from the ethnic minorities, just to bring some balance to the organisation. What my hon. and learned Friend says is perfectly true. The ethnic minorities have a very strong work presence—certainly at Heathrow. I am not so sure whether that matters in Scotland. British airports are major employers and are to be congratulated on that. We look forward to the creation of many more jobs for all sections of the community.

To go back to what I was saying, to control the ownership of our airports and to provide safeguards, I should like to see provisions in the articles of association of the company similar to those for British Aerospace, British Telecom and Britoil, and such as will exist for British Gas. The Minister must make it clear when he replies to this part of the debate what type of restrictions and wording, if any, the Government would like to see in the articles of association to ensure that the British Airports Authority remains largely in the ownership of the British people.

Mr. Stephen Ross: The hon. Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. King) mentioned at the end of his speech what we want to hear from the Minister. We want to know what provision will be made for workers' share opportunities in the privatisation of the British Airports Authority, if this has to go through. I totally disagree with privatisation, but if it has to happen at least let the workers have a share in it. Will there be an offer similar to that made to those who work for British Telecom —because that is what we want to hear—and will there be a golden share? The point that was raised was valid. The arguments made in the debate about the acceptability of the clause are quite valid too. The country will want to have assurances about these matters.

I realise that the Bill still has some way to go through the other place, and it may be that Government have not entirely made up their mind. Nevertheless, we are entitled to know here and now what the Government intend to do when they float the British Airports Authority.

Mr. Bill Walker (Tayside, North): When he replies to the debate, my hon. Friend the Minister must tell us what the effect of these two new clauses would be. If either or both were accepted, how would it affect a privatised British Airports Authority? How would they affect a privatised authority if it was considering investing in airports in other parts of the world? I imagine that after it is privatised it might develop the kind of expertise that would be marketable in other parts of the world. That being so, it might well wish to invest not only its skill but its funds, so as to increase the profitability of its organisation — something of which we would all approve.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Ancram): We have had an interesting debate on what appeared at first sight to be a fairly simple and straightforward new clause. We have learnt about the travelling habits of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Perth and Kinross (Mr. Fairbairn) and about the military distinction of the hon. Member for West Bromwich, East (Mr. Snape). We are in a sense facing two new clauses which are similar in intent but distinguishable in the way in which they try to achieve their purpose.

New clause 3 aims to restrict the ownership of shares in the British Airports Authority's successor company, its subsidiaries established as part of the restructuring arrangements in clause 1 of the Bill, or in airport companies formed by local authorities. New clause 11 places somewhat more limited restrictions on shareholding in the BAA's successor company.

The hon. Member for West Bromwich, East, rather to the surprise of his supporters—as he would have seen had he been able to look over his shoulder—put forward patriotism as the reason for this new clause. Members on the Government Benches always welcome any indication of patriotism from members of the Opposition.

Mr. Frank Cook: I seek your guidance, Mr. Deputy Speaker. It may be a historical reference, but is it not true to say that it has always been the working classes of this country that have risen promptly to defend the flag, and not members of the party in government?

Mr. Ancram: I am tempted to say, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that they protest too much. I was merely complimenting the hon. Member on putting forward the argument of patriotism. I thought that the argument put forward by my hon. Friend the Member for Hertfordshire, South-West (Mr. Page) was more realistic. He dealt with the problems that might arise rather than drawing the dark and dramatic picture with which the hon. Member for West Bromwich, East tried to justify his new clause.

I do not consider that the significant restrictions on the ownership of shares in airport companies, proposed by both new clauses in different ways, are necessary, because the Bill itself provides a series of safeguards against undesirable action taken by an airport company, control of which has been acquired by a particular shareholder or class of shareholder. I believe that my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. King) in a sense, suggested that these controls were available and that we should look at them again. I would like to go through some of them now. I do not apologise to the House for taking time to do so because it is important that hon. Members are aware of the existing safeguards.

For instance, the Civil Aviation Authority, as airport regulator, has powers under clause 38 of the Bill to prevent any trading practice or pricing policy which unreasonably discriminates against any class of user, or particular users, of an airport, or which unfairly exploits the airport's bargaining position—for instance, in setting the general level of charges. These powers could be used if an airline gained a degree of control over an airport company and sought to charge its own aircraft at more favourable rates than those of competing airlines, for instance, or unreasonably discriminated over the provision of services and facilities to airlines using the airport.

The CAA also has powers to prevent predatory pricing. At the designated airports, which will comprise the BAA's three London airports and Manchester, the CAA will be required to set limits on airport charges. The Monopolies and Mergers Commission will review all aspects of the airport business every five years. In addition, there are safeguards to prevent discrimination over access to an airport. Airports which hold public use licences issued by the CAA must not allow discrimination over access. Clause 32 of the Bill ensures that the CAA can require an airport to hold a public use licence. This power is further reinforced by clause 27, which ensures that the Secretary of State can direct an airport to comply with our international obligations, including those in respect of non-discrimination over access to airports.

Safety will continue to be regulated by the CAA through the aerodrome licensing system. The Department of Transport will continue to regulate security, issuing directions to airports where necessary, under the Aviation Security Act 1982. In the event of war or emergency, the Government have wide-ranging powers under the Civil Aviation Act 1982. It is, therefore, very difficult to see what benefit could be gained by an individual or company seeking to make a substantial investment in an airport company, other than the normal commercial benefit of investment in a profitable venture.

There are other safeguards as well. There are the safeguards of the Fair Trading Act 1973, ensuring that there can be a reference to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission if a shareholder proposes to acquire enough shares to be in a position materially to influence policy or to gain effective control. If the proposed acquisition is judged by the MMC as being against the public interest —several of my hon. Friends raised hypotheses about this—the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry has powers to prevent it. This provides yet a further safeguard against the purchase of shares for use in a manner which is detrimental to the interests of airports or their users.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hertfordshire, South-West and others of my hon. Friends foresaw serious practical problems about some of the restrictions proposed by both new clauses. The proposed restriction on foreign ownership would contravene our obligations under the treaty of Rome and would therefore seem to be ruled out.

Furthermore, a restriction on the size of any shareholding to 2 per cent. of the shares, as proposed by new clause 3, would be absurdly low. It could prevent the establishment of a market in the shares and would probably contravene the European Community admissions directive, applied by the Stock Exchange (Listing) Regulations 1984, which requires shares to be "freely negotiable". Any such general restrictions on the size of shareholdings, including the 15 per cent. restriction proposed in new clause 11, would also have the serious disadvantage of making the companies "bid-proof", removing a clear incentive for efficiency by removing any threat of takeover. Therefore, it appears that the protection which my hon. Friends want is in place in any event either within the Bill or within existing legislation. Indeed, the new clauses themselves would contravene certain of our obligations within the European Community.

I have listened carefully to the points made by my hon. Friends and in particular to the concern that it might just be possible for an airline controlling an airport to disadvantage other airlines in some subtle way, perhaps by pursuing investment policies which were not in the broader interests of United Kingdom aviation. So, while I consider that it would be a belt and braces approach, we are prepared to examine an appropriate restriction on shareholdings in BAA's successor company to meet the concern. If, on examination, we decide that this is warranted, we do not propose to write it into the Bill. Any such restriction would be written into the articles of association of the BAA's successor company, an effective mechanism which has been used in other privatisations and which is understood and accepted by investors.

If we go by that route, something which we wish to consider on examination, it would probably involve a golden share, about which the hon. Member for the Isle of Wight (Mr. Ross) asked. In those circumstances we would not want to give local authority airports less freedom than the BAA to introduce such restrictions, if they were considered desirable. We shall examine clause 24 and, if necessary after consideration, we shall bring forward an amendment in another place.

In the light of what I have said, I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Hertfordshire, South-West and the hon. Member for West Bromwich, East will withdraw their new clauses.

Mr. Snape rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Does the hon. Gentleman wish to have the leave of the House to speak again?

Mr. Snape: I do, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the hon. Gentleman have the leave of the House to speak again?

Hon. Members: Yes.

Mr. Snape: What the hon. Member for Edinburgh, South (Mr. Ancram) has just said is of some significance in the debate. However, I wish that he had been more clear about the Government's intentions. We have obviously worried the hon. Gentleman. I cannot claim any personal credit for the expression of worry that has flitted across the Minister's face, but the concern that has been expressed on both sides of the House during the short debate has caused some worry within the ministerial ranks.

So that we may decide whether that concern is sufficient, let us examine the proposals that have been put forward and the hon. Gentleman's reactions to them. It is a strange Conservative party which says, "We cannot do anything to defend British interests because it might be contrary to the treaty of Rome." I do not know whether the new clause in my name and the names of my hon. Friends is contrary to the treaty of Rome, but, to be honest, I do not much care whether it is. I make no apology for that.

If I am, in the words of the hon. Member for Gillingham (Mr. Couchman), an unlikely standard bearer, in many ways he is an unlikely Tory. [Interruption.] I merely ask where he gets his patriotism from. When I looked at his track record, I noticed that he joined the family company in 1970. I congratulate him on being an achiever, if for no other reason than that within a very short time he became chairman and then a director of the company, so he is an unlikely standard bearer for British interests when we compare his track record with those of my hon. Friends. We make no apology for defending the interests of British aviation.

Mrs. Edwina Currie (Derbyshire, South): Cheap. That is not worthy of the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Snape: The hon. Lady has just joined us. It would be out of character for her to keep her mouth shut for longer than 30 seconds. The hon. Lady said, "Cheap." Whether she was imitating a budgerigar or participating in the debate I shall leave her to judge, but I do not think it is cheap to defend the interests of the last prosperous industry in Britain or to defend the patriotism of my hon. Friends. We get sick of being lectured on patriotism by a party that is anxious to parcel up and sell to anyone anywhere in the world any profitable sector of British industry. If it is patriotism to resist such conduct by the worst Government that this country has ever seen, we plead guilty to being patriots and are proud to do so.

We want to know more than the Under-Secretary of State has implied. He said that the Government might retain a golden share in a privatised BAA because of the likely impact of foreign ownership on the policies to be pursued by a particular BAA airport. The hon. Gentleman will know that, despite all the safeguards he has outlined, references to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission through the Office of Fair Trading are infrequent and difficult to come by. We are concerned that damage might be done to British aviation interests while the question whether a practice was fair was being considered.

A foreign airline or a large company which has a major or significant shareholding in a privatised BAA will not advertise the fact that it is seeking to influence the policy to be followed by a privatised airport. It will be done much more subtly, as the Conservative party knows. Regretfully, I cannot accept the Minister's assurances. He will have to come up with something more definite.

With regard to shareholding, the hon. Member for Hertfordshire, South-West (Mr. Page) said that he was not too bothered about upholding the figure of 15 per cent. referred to in his amendment. Again, to show how anxious we are to reach agreement, we shall not hold him to the 2 per cent. either. We feel that a limit must be laid down to the number of shares that can be held.

To say that the imposition of such a limit would reduce efficiency because it would prevent a future takeover is a laughable interpretation, and if we are talking about laughable interpretations, we have just the man for the job sitting on the Front Bench, in the person of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for Transport. It is a doctrine that I have never heard expounded by any chairman of any major company—that a firm is more efficient because it fears a takeover. We are normally told how efficient companies have been, regardless of attempts by their competitors to gobble them up. So we feel that a limitation on shareholding is necessary.

Mention was made during the debate of British Telecom. There is an example for all of us, even Conservative Members, to learn from. There are more British Telecom shareholders in Tokyo than there are in West Bromwich or, for that matter, in Birmingham, Northfield. I know that the hon. Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. King) is not a shareholder, and I hope he will take it from me that more British Telecom shares are held in Tokyo than are held in his own constituency. Is that the sort of patriotism that the hon. Member for Gillingham professes to defend?

We insist on a shareholding limit, whatever it is—not necessarily the 2 per cent., or the 15 per cent. which the hon. Member for Hertfordshire, South-West indicated, but certainly some limitation, if only to protect the future policies of these privatised airports and to defend the future interests of British aviation.

For those reasons alone, I hope that despite, shall I say, the arguments that I have marshalled the Conservative party will for once stop talking about patriotism and vote for it.

Mr. Richard Page rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the hon. Member have the leave of the House to speak again?

Hon. Members: Yes.

Mr. Page: With the leave of the House, I shall take only a few minutes to respond, with a slight contrast in style, to the Minister's speech. I thank him for listening to the concerns expressed on both sides of the House. I am glad that he is to look at the matter again. I believe that the whole House will be glad to know that this issue will be given a second going over and that, if necessary, the golden share will be introduced.

New Clause 6

SCHEDULING COMMITTEE

'(1) At every airport licensed for public use under an Air Navigation Order there shall be a Scheduling Committee consisting of operators of aircraft using that airport for flights for the carriage of passengers or cargo for reward.

(2) Every such operator shall be entitled to be a member of the Scheduling Committee, and shall have one vote in its decisions, which shall be made at a meeting of the Committee by a three-quarters majority of the members present.

(3) Subject to the foregoing, the Scheduling Committee shall determine its own procedure.

(4) Subject to the provisions of section 30 of this Act, the Scheduling Committee shall have the function of allocating the times for the movements of aircraft at the airport, and it shall be the duty of the airport operator to take all necessary measures to give effect to the allocation so made.'.—[Mr. Steen.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Anthony Steen (South Hams): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this we may discuss the following amendments: No. 19, in clause 26, page 19, line 14, at end insert

'and the Scheduling Committee at the airport.'.

No. 40, in page 22, line 43, at end insert

'and

(c) the Scheduling Committee at the airport'.

No. 44, in clause 30, page 23, line 12, at end insert

'either for the period so specified or for the indefinite future as the case may be'.

No. 46, in page 23, line 18, after 'CAA', insert 'and the Scheduling Committee'.

No. 48, in page 24, line 12, after 'and', insert

No. 52, in page 24, line 25, after 'CAA', insert

'after consulting the Scheduling Committee at the airport'.

No. 53, in clause 32, page 25, line 20, leave out from 'An' to 'may' in line 21 and insert 'Air Navigation Order'.

Mr. Steen: New clause 6, read with the definition of "scheduling committee" in amendments Nos. 19 and 20, makes statutory provision for the existence and constitution of a scheduling committee at every airport. It has to be at every airport, otherwise the Bill would be a hybrid Bill. According to the chairman of the scheduling committee at Heathrow, who is employed by British Airways, the committee has no ambition to achieve statutory status and would prefer to remain wholly informal and to reach decisions, as at present, by consensus. If, however, part III of the Bill is retained, it will be necessary to confer statutory functions on the committee, in particular the right to allocate slots unless it notifies the Secretary of State that it is unable to do so, in which event the Civil Aviation authority will, under clause 30, act as a backstop by direction of the Secretary of State in drawing up a scheme for his approval. That involves giving the committee a statutory existence with a minimum of provisions as to what it is and how it is to reach decisions.

Those provisions have deliberately been kept sparse. They provide that every commercial operator, British or foreign, which uses the airport shall be entitled to be a member of the committee and to have one vote, which, it is believed, reproduces the informal position in the absence of the legislation that now exists.

I know that the voting arrangements in the clause which my hon. Friends and I are proposing have been criticised. I do not want to deal in detail with the voting arrangements. If the Minister believes this is the right way to proceed, I hope that he will develop some new arrangements. I should make it clear that the required majority for reaching a decision will be three quarters of the members present, whether or not some abstain, and by that method they could decide what voting arrangements to have. That would not mean one-man, one-vote right through; they could decide by a three-quarters majority to change that arrangement.

That should require a substantial consensus, which there is now, whether for allocating slots or for abandoning the process in favour of the Civil Aviation Authority and the Secretary of State. The proprietor of the airport would be obliged by clause 6(4) to a scheme adopted under clause 30 for his airport. It would be interpreted as requiring him to take all reasonable measures within his power.

"to take all necessary measures to give effect"

I have explained the technical side of things. I shall now give the off-the-cuff explanation. We have been fortunate in Britain in having trouble-free airports in terms of who goes where and which slots airlines occupy. The scheduling committee's arrangements have worked very well at Heathrow, Gatwick and other airports. The airlines get together at Heathrow under the chairmanship of a British Airways employee who acts in the fairest and most helpful way. It is a very successful committee. In this way, airlines come into Heathrow—and have done since the war—when they like, according to the availability of slots.

Although Heathrow is said to be near capacity, the House may be interested to know that British Midland Airways, in which I declare an interest, has today been granted a licence by the Civil Aviation Authority to fly to Amsterdam from Heathrow as often as it likes. It managed today to get the slot that it wants out of Heathrow to Amsterdam. It will start in the near future. That is at a time when we are told that Heathrow is reaching full capacity. The scheduling committee has worked very well.

We are concerned that the Bill makes no provision for a scheduling committee. Once the airports are privatised, there will be nothing to stop the new operators from saying, "We will not have a scheduling committee. We will decide when the aeroplanes can fly in and they must pay for it." The bigger the aeroplanes, the more they will like it, because they get more money from more passengers.

The scheduling committee acts impartially, and all of the airlines have a say. It has worked well. There has been very little discussion of this agreement. New clause 6 would enshrine an arrangement which has worked very well at Heathrow and Gatwick.

My hon. Friends may have received letters from the chairman of the scheduling committee saying that it does not want this new clause because scheduling committees are not needed in other airports. As I have explained, this would become a hybrid Bill if the new clause applied only to Heathrow and Gatwick.

I can understand the Government's anxiety about Gatwick and Heathrow reaching capacity. It is said that air traffic movements are near capacity. That is the view, but it is not borne out by the facts. There is a lot of spare capacity at Heathrow and there would be even more spare capacity at Gatwick and Heathrow if the national air traffic control services were not so hidebound by the military. As the House probably knows, an air marshal is chairman of the national air traffic control services. He imposes the military approach on flexibility and the ability to find new slots—50 per cent. for the military, 50 per cent. for the Civil Aviation Authority.

Instead of squeezing more out of the system and finding new ways in which to get more aeroplanes in, the Government are talking about limits. The inspector of the fourth London air terminal inquiry tried to impose a limit. The Government lifted that limit and the Civil Aviation Authority has pushed it even further, saying that it is not enough to have 275,000 movements an hour, but that there can be 325,000. It is now said that there can be up to 400,000 movements.

Mr. Bill Walker: I am sure that my hon. Friend is aware that the chairman of the national air traffic control services is a civil servant and that his deputy is an air vice-marshal. Moreover, the chairman of the National Air Traffic Management and Consultative Committee, is a serving air commodore. Because of that complexity and the fact that the air commodore is in charge of the consultative committee, occasionally there are difficulties, which appear to have been exacerbated recently.

5.45 pm

Mr. Steen: I am always grateful for my hon. Friend's interventions, and this is no exception. He has put the matter and described the problem more clearly than I could. It is well known in the House that I have more air marshals and air vice-marshals in my constituency per square foot than any other hon. Member. However, I am sure that the air vice-marshal that my hon. Friend mentioned is not in my constituency.

There might be a limit at Heathrow or Gatwick, but that time is far off and would be further off if the military did not have such involvement in the present antiquated system. I believe that it was in New York that it was decided that a new way in which to get more aeroplanes into the area had to be found. The system was reviewed and means were found of bringing in more aircraft safely. That is the problem in NATCS. It keeps using the safety argument and fails to find new means, devices and technical developments to bring in more aeroplanes and passengers.

My hon. Friend the Minister has taken the NATCS problem on board. We would all like to hear what he is doing about it. Heathrow and Gatwick have finite capacity, and the limit will probably be reached at Gatwick first. My hon. Friend is anxious that, when capacity is reached, whether at peak times or completely, there should be some mechanism for coping with the scheduling committee which, hitherto friendly, might start to fight because there is no more space.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State's approach is that there is a full lifeboat. A chap swims to the lifeboat, but, if he gets in, someone must be displaced or the lifeboat will sink. The Secretary of State says that he will decide which chap to throw out and which to bring in. That is the wrong approach. How will he decide which chap to throw out? That is an impossible job. I do not wish to embarrass my right hon. Friend by saying that he would not make the right decision, but he cannot throw out foreign airlines because of bilateral agreements. He can throw out only British airlines. If he has no statutory scheduling committee, my right hon. Friend is saying that we will have to bring in a foreign airline, clinging on to the edge of the lifeboat, and throw out a British airline.

How will my right hon. Friend throw out a British airline? What will be the result? He must tell us how he will operate a scheduling committee from Whitehall. The only other approach is to say that the scheduling committee will make the final decision. I believe that that happens in Tokyo. The committee might say, "We are full on Mondays and Wednesdays, but you can come in on Tuesday afternoon. There will be no appeal." That is what has happened in Britain thus far. The committee will say that there is no space, or it will push NATCS to find space, but it will not allow an appeal to the Secretary of State.

If we were to allow an appeal to the Secretary of State beyond the scheduling committee, what would he do? He would be placed in control of the lifeboat. The scheduling committee would collapse, because the airlines coming into Heathrow would say, "We have no business with the scheduling committee. We want to come in at 10 o'clock. We will appeal direct to the Secretary of State." To allow that airline in, my right hon. Friend would have to throw out a British carrier, and the British carrier, back in the water, would in turn appeal to the Secretary of State, so he would spend all his time, day and night, coping with Gatwick and Heathrow and the limited capacity that he had created. There would be no problem if the scheduling committee were to decide that the limit had been reached.

Mr. Terry Dicks (Hayes and Harlington): My hon. Friend must be aware that in the past the system that he is advocating has not worked because some British airlines, when told by the scheduling committee that they could arrive or take off at specified times, have flatly refused to abide by that decision and have sent out schedules showing that they would not arrive and take off at other times. Indeed, one airline—my hon. Friend probably knows of the case—pushed itself on to the line and took off at the wrong time.

Mr. Steen: I am sure that my hon. Friend is quoting the exception rather than the rule. The general rule is that the scheduling committee has worked successfully since the war. Everyone accepts that it has worked well. I understand what my hon. Friend says, but his example would not be covered by the Bill.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Michael Spicer): Why should we place more trust in the scheduling committee, which is mostly composed of foreign airlines, not to throw British airlines out of the lifeboat than we would in the Secretary of State?

Mr. Steen: The Minister poses a problem which has not existed and which need not exist. He should accept that the airlines can run their own operations. Conservative Members believe in consensus, not in more centralised control. We prefer decentralisation to the consumer to central Government control. The new clause would enshrine in statute a system which has existed largely without fault for the past 40 years at Gatwick, Heathrow and other airports.

The Minister says that he does not believe that the system will work when the airports are privatised. Why not? Why should the scheduling committee cease to be effective as soon as airports are privatised? The Minister should realise that the airports are under no obligation to set up scheduling committees. They could allow planes to come in when they liked and charge higher sums for slots, which would then be marketable.

Conservative Members are 100 per cent. in favour of privatisation, but we must protect the small airlines which will suddenly be pushed out of the best slots by the big airlines from other countries, which would pay more for the slots or would say, "There are more passengers at 10 o'clock than at 12 o'clock, so we will put the small airlines in at 12 o'clock." We must protect our industry, rather than score goals against our own side. Conservative Members who support the new clause fear that that may happen.

I do not wish to labour the point, which has been well made. I wish to discuss amendments Nos. 44, 45 and 46, which run parallel to what I have just said. If my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State believes that we cannot set up a statutory scheduling committee, he should have regard to those amendments.

Amendment No. 44 goes to the heart of the matter. It would prohibit the making by the Civil Aviation Authority of a scheme to allocate times for the movement of aircraft into airports and its approval by the Secretary of State, unless the scheduling committee at the airport has thrown in its hand and notified the Secretary of State that it is unable to perform its task. That is the flip side of the coin. If there is no statutory scheduling committee, we must work on the basis that, once the airports are privatised, they will set up scheduling committees, because that is the only way in which airports can operate. The Secretary of State should not become involved unless they press the emergency button. Let them continue to run the airports until they say that they have reached capacity and cannot squeeze in another plane at peak times or generally. Once they have pushed the emergency button, the Secretary of State will have to make the decision. That system will not work because all the airlines will follow suit and will want to go to the Secretary of State.

The amendemt would express what is understood to be the Government's intention—to provide the CAA and the Secretary of State as backstops in case the aircraft operators using the airport cannot adopt an allocation of slots by consensus.

I am grateful to the chairman of Brymon Airways, which flies to my constituency, for helping to draft the new clause. He used to work for British Airways. He proposed this as an alternative to a statutory scheduling committee. Not only does this accord with the principles generally accepted in the free world, and strongly supported by British Airways, but it was evidence to the terminal 4 planning inquiry that the scheduling should be done by consensus of users, not by Government or other official bodies. The consequence of this essential amendment is that it becomes necessary to give the scheduling committee, if not a statutory status, some status which, according to information from the scheduling committee for Heathrow, the airlines do not expecially desire. The necessary statutory status will be conferred by new clause 6, which, of course, attempts to do this in a sparing way but leaves each of the scheduling committees to manage their affairs as much as possible.

The proposal is of great concern to nearly all British carriers. They have had differences of opinion about the voting methods and make-up of the operation, but I have not heard a British independent or state airline say that the scheduling committee is not the right way to run the operation. I will not list all the airlines that I have contacted, but they all say that we must have scheduling committees at Heathrow and Gatwick. We cannot allow the Secretary of State to dominate the scene. There would be no problem with this Secretary of State. He would do it extremely efficiently. However, what would happen if we had a new Secretary of State or—heaven forbid—a Labour Secretary of State? That would completely change the picture.

Without making too many nasty jibes — the hon. Member for Aberdeen, North (Mr. Hughes) did not make a party political point about this—Opposition Members should agree that it is extremely important that we listen to what the airlines have to say — not only the independent airlines, but the state-run carriers. If they want scheduling committees, what steps will the Minister take to ensure that they are set up? They are not covered by the Bill, and the private airport operators are not obliged to have them. What steps will he take to reduce his power of intervention so that it is not a matter of the Secretary of State versus the airlines, but one of consensus among the airline users? Conservative Members believe strongly that the Minister will get it wrong if he allows the Bill to proceed without amendment or the new clause.

Mr. Robert McCrindle (Brentwood and Ongar): I shall address the House rather more briefly than my hon. Friend the Member for South Hams (Mr. Steen)——

Mr. Steen: But not as well.

Mr. McCrindle: That is a matter of opinion. I leave my hon. Friend to form his own opinion.

Speaking as a signatory of the new clause, I hope that the Minister will find it possible to accept it. Perhaps it is the combination of experience in this place and a certain scepticism when I anticipate a ministerial reply that leads me to express to my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State the even more fervent hope that if, for some reason, he finds it impossible to accept the clause as it stands—I accept that it is a fairly extensive clause with many implications — he will find it possible to accept the principle which underlies it, which holds out the concept of the scheduling committee as a well-tried instrument embodying voluntary association and self-regulation. I should be surprised if the Minister did not find it possible to go along with the clause that far and accept that the scheduling committee have built up a considerable standing over the years.

The Minister might consider it appropriate to introduce some qualifications which would render it impossible to accept the new clause as it stands. I hope to persuade him that, even if that were to be the direction of his response, he would be able to underpin the scheduling committee as a tried and tested instrument.

It may be said that it would be better by far to leave the creation of the scheduling committees entirely to the airport authorities and the airlines, and in an ideal world I would have to accept that proposition. My hon. Friend the Minister must understand that the shape of the Bill necessarily means that we are creating an entirely new situation which is fraught with difficulties and viewed by the airlines with a considerable degree of apprehension. In an attempt to persuade my hon. Friend to assist my hon. Friend the Member for South Hams and myself in the pursuit of the new clause—he knows that I try always to assist him—I hope that he will be able to say, if he feels that it goes too far, that he approves the principle of scheduling committees but believes that to impose a scheduling committee on every small airport throughout the country would be taking the principle a little too far.

If the Minister were prepared to argue along those lines and were prepared to advance alternative solutions, I suspect that some of my hon. Friends would understand that approach and would feel that in some respects the proposition contained in the new clause would be improved as a result. I took the point of my hon. Friend the Member for South Hams when he explained that, if he had taken that line within the clause, he would have created hybridity. If we can persuade the Minister to accept the principle that is contained in the clause and to endorse the concept of scheduling committees, I believe that common sense will dictate when a scheduling committee becomes necessary. If my hon. Friend the Minister prefers his own formula, I doubt whether too many of my hon. Friends would insist that every last word and detail of the new clause should be incorporated in the Bill.

If the new clause is at least acceptable in principle, it may be expecting too much to go along with the proposition that every airport user should have equal voting rights. It would be nonsense if every user—some users might operate an airline service no more than once a week—were to have the same power, influence and voting capacity as international airlines that use a certain airport every day. There would be a strong case, subject to the principle of a scheduling committee being accepted, for having some weighting attached to the voting within the scheduling committee.

That is the nub of the appeal that I want to make to the Minister. He may decide that although the concept of the scheduling committee is acceptable to him and has been tried and tested by long experience, he does not wish to enshrine it in legislation. I ask him to think carefully before he reaches that conclusion, because there is no doubt that there is a vast feeling of apprehension within the airline industry. I believe that it would give a great deal of comfort to those who are broadly in support of the main issues underlying the Bill if there were to be written into it the requirement to create a scheduling committee.

[Mr. McCrindle]

In supporting the broad approach of the Bill, I look forward to the reply of my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State. I anticipate that he will agree with the principle that underlies the new clause and that he may even agree, subject to the qualifications that I have outlined, that it should be incorporated in the Bill rather than proceeding on a voluntary basis.

Mr. Bill Walker: I apologise to the House for not being present when the debate began. I was detained outside the House prior to the debate being initiated by my hon. Friend the Member for South Hams (Mr. Steen).

The new clause, which is linked to many amendments, deals primarily with the need to introduce more competition at our airports. However, I shall deal first with scheduling committees—I hope to do so briefly—before addressing myself to the introduction of greater competition.

My hon. Friend the Member for South Hams mentioned that the airlines are uneasy about the operation of national air traffic control services, and I have expressed unease as well. It is no secret that that has upset some of my former colleagues in the Royal Air Force, who are unhappy about some of the things that I have said. I must repeat that what I said in earlier debates was factually correct. I am sure that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State is well aware that in my presence the airlines expressed their unhappiness about certain features of national air traffic control services. No one doubts their professionalism and integrity and the efforts that they are making to do the best that they can, but there are doubts about whether adequate consultation is taking place and whether sufficient in-depth consideration is being given to the operation of the modern air transport business. Those feelings lie behind the unhappy atmosphere that exists, which I am confident can be removed.

Amendment No. 69, which I tabled, was intended to deal with that problem. I make no comment on the fact that the amendment has not been selected, save that I believe that it would have dealt positively with the root cause of the problem, which is what the consultative process is not working in the way that Parliament intended. Given the way in which national air navigation orders are dealt with, we cannot pray against them. Amendment No. 69 was intended to make the necessary changes to ensure that in future the House would have the opportunity to pray against navigation orders where there was obviously unease, unhappiness and uncertainty. It was never intended to impinge upon the professionalism of those who make recommendations to the Secretary of State on matters of air safety. The amendment was directed to the introduction of the consultation that Parliament intended.

Mr. Steen: I endorse what my hon. Friend is saying, but I think that his argument goes a little further than he has suggested. If the capacity of the NATCS system expanded, the need for the Minister to have reserve powers to deal with an airport which reached capacity would never materialise, especially with the larger aircraft that are coming on stream.

Mr. Walker: I agree that many bogeys have been created by those who have suggested what may or may not take place. Great concern was expressed that airports would reach maximum capacity with the growth that was expected and that the system would become clogged. That fear was expressed in aviation debates no more than five years ago, or perhaps a little further back than that. In fact, that has not happened.

Anyone who has spoken to the people who run the scheduling committees will know that the airlines have confidence in those committees. The committees do trade-offs or deals, call it what one will, but among themselves they reach agreement on how the slots can be allocated.

It would be helpful if something could be put into the Bill to guarantee that there will be no possibility of any future interference by airport authorities in the allocation of times for the movement of aircraft at busy airports. It may be possible to do that in the other place. That sums up the problem. All the airlines fear that at some time in the future the airport owners, managers or authorities will interfere in the allocation of slots.

I am sure that my hon. Friend the Minister, who has tried to be helpful on these difficult matters in the past, will realise that it is more sensible to have a provision in the Bill rather than write it in, as the amendments do, that scheduling committees must be a statutory requirement. It would be much better to remove the root cause of the problem, which is the intention of my amendment No. 69.

I shall be speaking later on new clause 9, but I shall not spend much time on it because I hope to deal with most of what will be in that new clause on new clause 6 because the two are related. There is no doubt that the airlines are concerned that once the BAA enters the private sector it will be under no statutory duty to meet demands. New clause 6 is to move

"the exclusive right of providing operating and/or licensing airport terminals and/or other associated airport activities"

Am I reading the wrong proposal?

Hon. Members: Yes.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will not deal with new clause 9, which is in the next grouping.

Mr. Walker: It is my fault; I came in late. I did not know the point we had reached. I apologise.

I have said as much as I intend to say at this stage on the matter of national air traffic control services. I shall deal with new clause 9 when we get to it.

Mr. Ernie Ross: I intervene briefly, as I have an airport in my constituency which was not dealt with in the Bill because it did not qualify in terms of the traffic generated. I also intervene with some hesitation because the airport is supported by a local authority with which I have political differences on a daily basis. However, the airport serves Dundee and Tayside. Tayside regional council has provided a service which is absolutely necessary if regeneration of Dundee is to take place.

I was not able to be present in Committee, but having listened to the hon. Member for South Hams (Mr. Steen) speak I can see that there must have been some disagreement in Committee and that there may have been some concern on both sides of the Committee among hon. Members who have small operators at an airport in their constituency.

In Dundee, the present operator, EuroAir, as recently as Monday, introduced a second service for Dundee. The two services are a direct link between Dundee and Heathrow, with a stop at Carlisle. We want to know from the Minister, if he does not accept the new clause, what provision there is within the Bill, what powers he will have and what guarantees and assurances he can give to small operators that once the airports, particularly Heathrow, are privatised they will not find their current slots put out to the highest bidder. Certainly, if EuroAir had to bid for its present slots into Heathrow against TWA or any other international airline it would obviously be unsuccessful.

At present, the service operates using a 748 carrying about 40 passengers. It is vital to the well-being of Dundee and Carlisle. We want to hear from the Minister that small and medium-sized operators can expect some protection to ensure that once the airports are privatised the users committee, the scheduling committee or the airports authority itself does not put the various slots out to the highest bidder so that they will lose out.

Mr. Bill Walker: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that, with all the other developments in Tayside, such as the enterprise zone and various other high technology areas and the high technology park, the airport is seen as an essential part of communications and that the new operations by EuroAir are seen by the local people as being essential? Getting into Heathrow is vital for such operations.

Mr. Ross: Absolutely. When we were trying to attract industry to Dundee, someone coming from abroad would arrive at Heathrow, change planes and go on a shuttle to Edinburgh and there was then either a car or train journey from Edinburgh to Dundee. People were not interested. We now have a twice-daily direct service to Dundee and we find that it is easy to attract prospective industrialists to Dundee. More importantly, we have given the people and the companies currently in Dundee a direct link between Dundee and Heathrow. From Heathrow they are able to take a connecting service to their destination. Therefore, the service benefits Dundee and Tayside and we would wish to protect it.

Companies the size of EuroAir are obviously operating in a competitive market and are finding the costs difficult to meet. If EuroAir lost its Heathrow slot, I think that that might well be the end of the service for Dundee. It could be a serious blow to the Government's intentions because they have spent a considerable amount of money trying to regenerate Dundee and part of that regeneration is the attraction of the direct link between Dundee and Heathrow.

Mr. Dicks: I should like to speak in general support of new clause 6. There are about 70 airlines in Heathrow, in my constituency. The scheduling committee has operated very well, generally speaking, for some considerable time. In an intervention in the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for South Hams (Mr. Steen) I said that on one or two occasions the decisions of the scheduling committee had been bypassed. However, they were exceptions, as was rightly pointed out.

The airlines that use Heathrow generally feel that the scheduling committee should remain intact and that the Secretary of State's powers should be used as a last resort. The airlines have asked me to make the point that, if the 77 or so operators can come together and agree about how the runway should be used and the times the runway should be used, that is how it should be left. I accept that there could be some effect of weighting. I am concerned not about one airline, one vote but about the principle of leaving the operation of the runways to the scheduling committee and those airlines which operate in and out of Heathrow and make it the successful international airport that it is.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): I intervene briefly to support the points made by my hon. Friend the Member for Dundee, West (Mr. Ross).

Two weeks ago, the Civil Aviation Authority produced a document called CAP 157—[HON. MEMBERS: "It is 517."] Hon. Members may well correct me. I am no expert in these matters, and I did not serve on the Committee. The document suggested that certain routes should be removed from Heathrow; certain airlines would no longer be able to operate from there, in favour of larger operators, because their interlining activity was not substantial enough.

Over the past few weeks, several smaller operators have objected strongly. I am told that those matters are currently being discussed in the scheduling committee at Heathrow, but the smaller operators are concerned about whether their interests will be fairly represented in those debates. Listening to today's debate, and particularly to the hon. Member for South Hams (Mr. Steen) in moving his new clause and putting his case to the House, I thought that we might well need the Secretary of State to intervene. The only way in which we can secure the survival of the small regional routes may be by way of political intervention. We may not be able to rely on the arrangements that the hon. Gentleman wishes to set up. Pressure might be exerted, for commercial reasons, for the largest operators willing to pay the highest prices to have the routes, which might not be in the best interests of the smaller operators.

Mr. Steen: The point that the hon. Gentleman makes is valid if the capacity of the airport has reached saturation. However, does he agree that there are two ways of approaching that? First, a scheduling committee might say, "Sorry—Tuesdays afternoons only"—that would be for everybody — or one could destroy the scheduling committee and make the Secretary of State answer every airline's request for a slot. He then becomes the scheduling committee. Alternatively, the Secretary of State can say, "I cannot do this. I shall appoint an agent, as they do in Spain and Portugal." That agent would be British Airways, which would have to decide everything. That might be worse.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: All that I want is an arrangement whereby I know that commercial pressures can be resisted. If it means that the politician is uniquely able to resist those pressures, I must support the right of the politician, indeed the Secretary of State, to do so. If we cannot rely on the scheduling committees to look reasonably at the rights of smaller airlines that cannot pay higher prices, we must resist the new clause. I would have to vote against it if it were forced to a Division.

Mr. Snape: May I assist my hon. Friend before he takes that decision? I am following carefully what he is saying, but is he aware that the present Secretary of State proposed in a previous Civil Aviation Bill, which was defeated in Committee, to auction off slots at airports such as Heathrow to the highest bidder, which in itself would have militated against the interests of smaller airlines, which he and, I think, the hon. Member for South Hams

[Mr. Snape]

(Mr. Steen) are seeking to defend? Therefore, with some Secretaries of State I might be able to support my hon. Friend, but I cannot do so with the present one. I think that the hon. Member for South Hams will agree with me on that.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: I accept my hon. Friend's point, but everyone, including the Secretary of State for Transport, has to take into account the considerable regional pressures—not only Labour but Conservative—that would be exerted upon any Secretary of State who thought that he could deal with the regional routes in that way. Some hon. Members would vigorously oppose the auctioning off of those routes if it meant that we were to lose the service that is currently available to small local airports.

I have intervened to draw attention to the CAA document 517, which is causing great concern. One problem is that we believe that the material on which the conclusions in that document were based is faulty. It is based on research that was done prior to EuroAir being the carrier, when Air Ecosse was the carrier. EuroAir is most concerned that its future should not be wrapped up in arguments and discussions about the effectiveness of Air Ecosse. We are grateful for the work that Air Ecosse did in the development of that route, but it has not provided, and did not at that stage seek to provide, the level and frequency of service that EuroAir has successfully provided since it took over in November. If any such decisions are to be taken in the future, they must be based on brand new research.

If that research takes place, the Minister will find that much of the traffic being developed by EuroAir is interline traffic, whether passenger or cargo. That traffic is crucial to the development of the route. We cannot afford to lose it. We are looking to the Minister to protect our airline. In the county of Cumbria, we see it as our airline in the same way as my hon. Friend the Member for Dundee, West does in Dundee. The future of that route needs to be secured. I hope that the Minister, if only in a giveaway remark, will show some understanding of the position in which we find ourselves.

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip-Northwood): My hon. Friend the Member for South Hams (Mr. Steen) and Conservative co-signatories of his new clause are introducing one of the most important aspects of the debate in terms of the effect of the new clause on the airlines and the potential benefit to the travelling public.

The hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) was right to put the debate in the context of the document CAP 517, which was advice to the Secretary of State from the Civil Aviation Authority on air traffic distribution in the London area.

The new clause may have its minor deficiencies. Of course, some airports licensed for passenger traffic will have, for example, only one operator with an air operator's certificate. In those circumstances, I wonder how the three-quarters majority will be achieved. However, those are matters of detail that I am sure, with good will, the Minister can put right in the other place.

Nevertheless, the principles of new clause 6 is exceedingly important—that in the scheduling committees, the voluntary agreements of carriers should have priority and be paramount in the allocation of slots and of movements in the light of the capacity available at particular airports. In past years—several of us will be veterans in these matters, not least my hon. Friend the Member for South Hams—we have seen the attempts by the Government to forecast movements and to match those forecasts with what they believe the capacity of certain airports to be. Ever since the abortive attempt to have a new airport at Maplin, we have seen those forecasts go awry. Even Governments in their wisdom cannot foresee precisely the future level of traffic or demand. Therefore, the best people to allocate slots and to decide how those slots are to be matched to capacity are the airlines themselves. As my hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington (Mr. Dicks)—perhaps I may call him the Member for Heathrow—rightly said, the system has worked exceedingly well, and the intervention of the Secretary of State should be a last resort, a backstop, if voluntary regulation and agreement fail.

It is noteworthy that the CAA, in the press release that it issued on 25 March, when it published CAP 517, clearly stated:

"The vast majority of those consulted urged that the present system should be allowed to continue whereby slots at congested airports are allocated on a purely voluntary basis through a Scheduling Committee composed of all airlines operating at the airport."

6.30 pm

The press release goes on to list a number of qualifications, but it also makes it clear that, in tendering this advice, the authority has taken account of the policy objectives of the Government—

"in particular the need for air services to be operated where they best meet the needs of the travelling public and the desire to maintain London as a major international centre."

The authority suggested a package of measures built round the existing scheduling committee system referred to by my hon. Friend the Member for South Hams. The hon. Member for Workington referred to the most alarming of those recommendations—the restriction at Heathrow on new domestic scheduled routes and, especially,

"a carefully phased removal from Heathrow, should the Scheduling Committee at Heathrow be unable to accommodate all reasonable demands for international scheduled services, of those domestic routes which carry only small numbers of passengers who travel to Heathrow in order to connect with an international flight. These are direct services from Heathrow to Carlisle and Dundee"—

the route mentioned by the hon. Gentleman. I remember the good old days when Autair started that route and we landed among the sheep at Crosby on Eden and then went on to Leuchars because Dundee Riverside had not been fully opened. The other direct services to be affected would be

"Inverness; Guernsey; The Isle of Man; Plymouth and Newquay."

I am sorry again for my hon. Friend the Member for South Hams, because he will have to travel by car to reach his constituency. The other route to be affected was the route to Jersey.

All these are important routes in their own way. The other major course suggested was a restriction on the number of daily flights which may be operated by domestic routes from Heathrow

"other than those with air services operated in an effective competitive environment (namely Heathrow to Glasgow, Edinburgh and Belfast)".

There is a problem here. However, over the years operators have been able to get together and make the best use of the slot time available. I am sure that will continue.

All the evidence suggests that the improvements in air traffic control, the opening of terminal 4, and, hopefully, the opening of a fifth terminal will overcome the difficulties. Therefore, there will be no need for the Secretary of State's new powers, especially the powers in clause 30(3)(b) for control of movement to be made by charging.

The CAA, in its press release, makes it clear that, in its judgment, that would lead "to increased domination by the larger and richer international scheduled airlines. The Authority concludes that a price mechanism, whether through increased landing charges, a direct passenger charge or the compulsory"—

I stress "compulsory"—

"trading of landing and take-off slots among airlines would not be compatible with the Government's objectives and would almost certainly be inconsistent with this country's international obligations."

That was referred to by my hon. Friend the Member for South Hams in his excellent opening speech.

The wisest course would be for the Government to accept this new clause or to amend the Bill in the other place to give effect to its provisions. That is what I recommend to the House.

Mr. Tony Lloyd (Stretford): This new clause has my support and I shall be interested to see how the Minister responds to the debate. In Committee we attempted to table amendments that would have had the effect of forcing upon the CAA and the Secretary of State the responsibility for promoting the interests of the regional airports and therefore the communities which they serve. Those amendments found no merit with the Government Front Bench and it is in that light that I give my support to this new clause.

There is a need to build in some measures which will protect the interests of the smaller airports precisely because it is the smaller airports which are serving the communities of Dundee, Carlisle and the other smaller areas mentioned by hon. Members. It is important that we have such a control. When the Minister replies I hope he will comment on the Civil Aviation Authority document which has been mentioned by various hon. Members.

That document did not come as a bombshell to some of us because we thought that that was what the CAA had always been up to. It certainly was contrary to the promises and claims that were given by the Secretary of State and by his Ministers. They assured us that the CAA would be objective and fair, and would try to assist the smaller airports. I would welcome a clear comment from the Minister on the CAA document. Will the Minister tell the CAA that he rejects the logic of its present approach? If he does not, his response will be grossly inadequate and will fail to recognise what the hon. Member for South Hams (Mr. Steen) has sought to do in the new clause. It is important to have the Government's position on record.

My preference has been that the regulation, at a political level, should ultimately rest with the Secretary of State. The Secretary of State should take control, as that is the normal way in which state bodies should be regulated. However, the present Secretary of State lectures about himself when he talks about the dangers of central Government control.

Sadly, on previous occasions the Secretary of State has demonstrated that his decisions are perverse and that they do not operate in the interests of the air traffic industry. I regret that it is for that reason that we have to move away from giving the Secretary of State such control. Such control ought to be given to the CAA because that is why it exists. The CAA, however, is operating in such a way as to suggest that it would not do the job which most of us would wish to see it do. Therefore, we have to move towards new self-regulation.

I mirror the words of my hon. Friend the Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) that, in some ways, it is odd that the users of a service should be the operators of this self-regulating system. There are inherent dangers in such a situation because the operators could set up their own neat, cosy arrangements and keep out those who, in the long run, would perform better than those in the existing set-up.

There is no absolute. I have reluctantly come to the conclusion that self-regulation has merit because it moves control out of the hands of those who have proven, by their actions, that we cannot trust them.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Does my hon. Friend accept that there is a danger in deploying arguments about the characteristics of individual Secretaries of State and the way that they may conduct themselves? We should take more of a macro view of these matters, irrespective of the political personalities involved. We should make our judgments on that basis.

Mr. Lloyd: How does my hon. Friend suggest that we take the macro view without examining the possibility that the present Secretary of State is, as Rab Butler said, the best Secretary of State that we have got? In those circumstances our macro view is bound to be conditioned firmly by the incumbent at any given time.

To that extent I am reinforced in my view that there is sufficient to commend this new clause because it moves us into an area where we have no reasons for distrust, whereas we distrust the other options put forward.

Mr. Robert Adley (Christchurch): I declare my interest in the hotel and tourist industry but that is the least of my considerations this evening. As my hon. Friend the Member for Ruislip-Northwood (Mr. Wilkinson) said, we have been having these discussions for some years. The real challenge is to decide who takes priority — the regional airports and the small carriers, or the big international airlines with the clout, carrying package tourists from California or Tokyo. My hon. Friend the Minister should always remember that he would be unwise to take action which could disadvantage regional airports and small airlines, which are struggling to build up services which are, and will in future be, a vital part of the industrial and commercial infrastructure of Britain, in favour of a step which may well bring in a few more package tourists. When it comes down to it, there are more people who will vote for him in Dundee and Workington than there are in Tallahassee or Tokyo.

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Cannock and Burntwood): This is an important matter and it has been well covered by my hon. Friend the Member for Ruislip-Northwood (Mr. Wilkinson). We are anxious to preserve the status quo. The scheduling committees have been operating quietly and unobtrusively — few hon. Members were aware of their existence until the debate on airport policy last year —and they have been highly successful.

The scheduling committees meet twice a year to plan the forthcoming season and to arrange the schedules for 80 busy airports around the world, with about 120 carriers involved. It is significant that, at a time when everybody is saying that Heathrow and Gatwick are full, that is not the case. It is not thanks to the BAA, but thanks to the work of the scheduling committees that those airports are able to take the extra capacity demanded of them by the airlines, who, after all, are the immediate customers of the airport.

The scheduling committees can slot in ad hoc charters in off-peak periods. They can slot in freighters and all sorts of extraneous flights which might otherwise be told by the airport operators, "Sorry, old boy, you can't come in. There is no room." Those people have set as their task the maximisation of the airport facility and they are to be congratulated on what they have done.

There is a difficulty in having majority voting and my hon. Friend the Member for South Hams (Mr. Steen) is aware of that. When the committees take about 2,000 decisions each season, or 4,000 decisions a year, it will be difficult for all those decisions to be arrived at by a majority vote. The chairman of the scheduling committee at Gatwick makes the important point:

"Each airline scheduler faces the same problems as his colleagues. He may require help one day and his colleagues may ask for reciprocal help the next. It is therefore the requirement of the guidelines that co-ordination should be conducted in an atomosphere of mutual trust and cooperation. This leads to the most efficient use of facilities and maximum benefit to the travelling public."

That makes the point most forcibly.

It may be that new clause 6 is not the best solution to the problem, but I urge my hon. Friend the Minister to accept that some provision should be made in the Bill to ensure that something which manifestly does work should be continued. We should not put that position in jeopardy when the BAA moves into the private sector. There is a problem because at the moment there is some ministerial control, but when the BAA moves into the private sector, that will not be there.

Mr. Steen: As soon as the BAA is privatised there need be no scheduling committee at all and I am sure that that is the crux of the matter to which my hon. Friend the Minister must direct his mind.

Mr. Howarth: My hon. Friend is right. That is why so many of us on both sides of the House have chosen to speak on this matter. There is concern that a privatised BAA may—I say "may" because one should not assume that it will be hostile to the scheduling committees—decide that it wants to make the allocation rather than the scheduling committees. That is why new clause 6 should be in the Bill.

The chairman of the Heathrow scheduling committee, Mr. Gerry Hewson, said:

"It is appreciated that it would be helpful to have a clause in the Bill which precluded the possibility of any future interference by airport authorities in the allocation of times for the movements of aircraft at a busy airport."

That is the essence. The fact that Cardiff, Birmingham or Dundee do not require scheduling committees does not matter. I hope that my hon. Friend has got the message that the scheduling committees have done such a marvellous job in helping the airlines and passengers at Gatwick and Heathrow that we do not want to lose them.

Mr. Michael Spicer: My hon. Friend the Member for Brentwood and Ongar (Mr. McCrindle) wanted me to accept the principle behind new clause 6, which is that the scheduling committee is a tried and tested organisation which works well and will continue to do so on a voluntary and self-regulating basis. That was the tone of many of the speeches that have been made by hon. Members on both sides of the House.

I should be happy to give the assurance for which my hon. Friend asks. There is no question but that the Government think that the scheduling committee does a good job in the way that my hon. Friends the Members for South Hams (Mr. Steen), for Cannock and Burntwood (Mr. Howarth) and others have eloquently stressed. There is nothing at all between us on that. The Government have no intention of altering that position or, indeed, of not supporting the present position. Nor does the CAA necessarily have any intention of not doing so.

Paragraph 3.94 of CAP 517 talks about the authority putting great weight on not disturbing existing arrangements prematurely. I do not disagree that there has to be a discussion about what is meant by "prematurely"——

Mr. Steen: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Spicer: It is a bit premature, but yes.

Mr. Steen: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving way at this early stage. He cites the CAA's document and says that there should not be premature interference. Does he agree that the Government should not interfere prematurely either?

Mr. Spicer: Having said that I can give my hon. Friend the Member for Brentwood and Ongar the assurance that he has sought, let me deal with the nub of the amendments, which are aimed at a statutory provision for the scheduling committees. Subsequent amendments are linked to new clause 6 which, for instance, will provide the scheduling committees with certain voting rules. It is not unfair to say at the beginning that the scheduling committees, certainly those at Gatwick and Heathrow, do not like the concept of a statutory provision for a scheduling committee. I am sure that my hon. Friend has seen a letter of today's date from the Gatwick scheduling committee addressed to myself, and no doubt to others. Indeed, it has been addressed to my hon. Friend. It states:

"The aviation industry does not need to have Scheduling Committees forced upon it."

On reflection, my hon. Friend the Member for South Hams may accept that it is the voluntary nature of the committees that is at least in part their strength.

To enshrine certain specific voting requirements in legislation might itself negate one of the main functions of the committees, which is to carry out—if that is the right word — the IATA rules. One of the functions which the scheduling committees carry out so well is to slot in international requirements. Slotting arrangements at particular airports must relate to the international scene.

One or two specific matters have been raised in our wide-ranging debate. First, I welcome what my hon. Friend the Member for South Hams told the House about British Midland's plans to fly to Amsterdam. I am sure that many of my hon. Friends and many Opposition Members will join me in welcoming that news. Competition on routes into Europe is essential to the Government's objectives. That announcement shows the working of the superb agreement that we have with the Dutch Government, whereby airlines can mount the frequencies that they wish and have almost complete freedom, subject to the fitness of the airline.

Mr. Snape: Superb for the Dutch.

Mr. Spicer: We have been talking about a third British airline which is apparently about to fly to Holland. What is the hon. Gentleman talking about?

Mr. Snape: The much-trumpeted agreement gives the Dutch the right to fly passengers from Heathrow to Schiphol and on to the far east at the rate that they would pay if they flew from London. In return, we are given Maastricht, which is the Dutch equivalent of Gateshead.

Mr. Spicer: One of the matters under discussion is Amsterdam.—[HON MEMBERS: "What is wrong with Gateshead?"] We are talking about Amsterdam. The hon. Gentleman is wrong again when he implies that the agreement is not working to the benefit of British airlines. Both British Caledonian and British Airways have had a much greater growth in traffic on that route than the average for the rest of Europe. They are doing extremely well on that route.

The questions raised by the hon. Members for Dundee, West (Mr. Ross) and for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) are not as marginal as they might appear. From the point of view of their different airports, they were concerned about the recommendations in CAP 517 for the removal, under certain circumstances, of access to Heathrow from Dundee or Carlisle. First, that is merely a recommendation by the Civil Aviation Authority. It has now been sent out for further consultation before a formal recommendation is made to the Government. The Government will then have to take a view about the formal recommendation. Not even the final round of recommendations from the CAA has been reached. I am sure that all those involved in the consultative process will have heard what the hon. Members said about new factors and frequencies.

Secondly—this may answer the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch (Mr. Adley)—the Government have made it clear that one of our prime objectives is to ensure fair access to Heathrow for the regional airlines from regional airports, for precisely the reasons that have been given in the debate. The House should consider whether, if, as the hon. Member for Workington suggested, one enshrined in legislation the absolute rights given to the scheduling committees, that would be more or less likely to preserve the integrity of regional routes and their access. That is a matter for debate.

When my hon. Friend the Member for South Hams made his brilliant analogy with a lifeboat, he kindly allowed me to ask him why he believed that the scheduling committee, on which there is a majority of large foreign airlines, should necessarily guarantee the access and competition that could perhaps be better supplied by the reserve powers given in the Bill to the Secretary of State.

Mr. Dicks: The answer is that the airlines are more likely to make the right decision than is the Secretary of State.

Mr. Spicer: My hon. Friend, who is proud of his constituency interest, talks about getting it right. However, getting things right is a subjective matter. Right for whom? The smaller airlines may not be so well represented in the scheduling committees, and one may ask whether the answer will be right for them.

Mr. Wilkinson: This matter is of great concern to hon. Members on both sides of the House. My hon. Friend quoted from the CAP document. The concluding major paragraph is germane to our discussion. It says:

"The Authority recommends that the measures to restrict access to Heathrow etc. should be brought in only when the Secretary of State is advised by those directly concerned that it is necessary to do so"

—in other words, by the airlines. The CAA

"has therefore avoided the need to forecast when these measures need to be taken and has not needed to assess the effects of future events such as the opening of the Channel Tunnel."

We are talking in a hypothetical way. All the evidence suggests that the present arrangements work perfectly well and that we should not seek to reinforce reserve powers for the Secretary of State.

Mr. Spicer: Hypothetical debates are always the best. I shall continue to present my hypotheses. My hon. Friend the Member for Ruislip-Northwood (Mr. Wilkinson) talked about the powers as backstop powers. I agree with him about that. It may well be, as my hon. Friend the Member for South Hams said, that the matter is 10 years off. I make no judgment about capacity at airports. I simply say that we believe that giving backstop powers to the Secretary of State under the Bill is the best approach to the matter, and preferable to giving, through legislation, the initiative to the scheduling committee.

As my hon. Friend the Member for South Hams said, new clause 6 is not the main point. One could make some play with new clause 6. Whether or not it is hybrid, one could say that it imposes conditions on airports that are not relevant. I think that my hon. Friend saw the new clause as a way of introducing the subject. He called amendment No. 44 the flip side of the coin, and I sense that that is the amendment that he wishes most to pursue.

I have outlined the basic problems of new clause 6. The scheduling committees—and, indeed, the industry—do not want that sort of compulsion, and its extension to all airports is something which I believe most hon. Members would think inappropriate.

Mr. Gerald Howarth: My hon. Friend fairly makes the point that the scheduling committees are apprehensive about new clause 6. However, as I have already said, the chairman of the Heathrow scheduling committee feels that it would be helpful to have a provision which precludes the possiblity of future interference by airport authorities in the allocation of times for the movement of aircraft at a busy airport. I am sorry to press my hon. Friend on this matter, but it is not quite as simple as he suggested.

Mr. Spicer: Both my hon. Friend and my hon. Friend the Member for South Hams raised that point in their speeches. The fear is that the change of ownership of an airport—this is the nub of the matter—will affect the status of the scheduling committees. I can say categorically that there would be no such effect. Indeed, the backstop powers in the Bill might guarantee the preservation of the present system. Nothing in the Bill constitutes a threat to the scheduling committees.

Mr. Robert Hughes: What backstop power in the Bill provides that a private owner must retain a scheduling committee?

Mr. Spicer: The Bill gives the Secretary of State the power to make rules and establish schemes for allocating capacity at airports. I am sure we agree that, in present circumstances, scheduling committees provide a good system. If an operator did not want that system, the Secretary of State would have the power to request schemes which reflected the operations of a scheduling committee.

Mr. Adley: The crucial point is that currently the small airlines know that they can raise matters with the Minister through their Member of Parliament. The fear is that the Bill will give the Secretary of State the power to deal with macro matters, but not with matters which, although small in terms of legislation, could be vital to the lifeline of a small airline. I do not wish to be too rude to the BAA, but I do not think that representations to it would be quite the same as representations to the Minister.

Mr. Spicer: In fact, it is the other way around. Clauses 28, 29 and 30 provide backstop powers for the Secretary of State to intervene in the sorts of matters mentioned by my hon. Friend, so the Bill is sound in that way. However, it does not enshrine the rights of scheduling committees——

Mr. Bill Walker: My hon. Friend knows that I believe that there should be a system of appeal to the Secretary of State, and on that he and I are at one. Can he confirm that when the Bill becomes law there will no longer be problems with air navigation orders? As he is well aware, it took me six years to achieve change, and a company could go out of business in that time. It is important that we do not have the same problems with slots and scheduling, especially for flights from Dundee, in which I declare an interest. Can my hon. Friend assure the House that we will not face the same ghastly situation as we faced on air navigation orders when we found ourselves impotent?

Mr. Spicer: My hon. Friend may wish to return to the question of air navigation orders, and especially the question of NATCS. On 26 February I met representatives of independent airlines, when they raised the question of NATCS and air navigation orders. I look forward to hearing in more detail from the independent airlines about the precise nature of the problem. I am sympathetic to the management and accountability problems of NATCS. My hon. Friend has often made the point about dual control, and it is something that we might wish to study. We do not have that sort of duality of control in other matters——

Mr. Steen rose——

Mr. Spicer: I am about to address myself to my hon. Friend's amendment No. 44. I do not wish to delay the House, but I shall give way to him if he wishes to question me once I have made my remarks.

The amendment takes the initiative on slot allocation schemes away from the Secretary of State and gives it to the scheduling committees. It would be wrong to do that, for at least two reasons, and there may be more. First, problems may arise if a scheduling committee is on the verge of breaking down. We have already discussed the operations of the scheduling committees where an airport may have scarce capacity—and even, at peak moments, a complete absence of capacity—but where, taken on a broad basis, it has not reached full capacity. The scheduling committees, in their wisdom and efficiency, have the capability to spread the load and to consult.

We may eventually reach the position—the time is a matter of debate—when an airport reaches full capacity. At that point, the airlines may be incapable of voluntarily reaching an agreement, with the consequence that the mechanism breaks down. If my hon. Friend the Member for South Hams is fair, he will admit the possibility of such a circumstance. Indeed, that is why hon. Members have referred to backstop powers.

A second point which I must make relates to the question raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington (Mr. Dicks) about whether a scheduling committee composed of independent airlines might, when capacity was used up, not always act in the public interest. It might be that the Government had policies about competition and about airlines flying in from individual regional points, and it might be that the scheduling committee was unable to cope in those circumstances.

Mr. Dicks: My hon. Friend keeps on confusing questions of definition. He mentions capacity. The problem at Heathrow is that people want to come in at a particular time. In this sense, it has nothing to do with capacity. People want come in at 10 am. A British airline wants to come in at 10 am, when there is a vacant slot at 3 pm, which is precisely the time when it wants to go back. My hon. Friend ought to differentiate clearly between the problem of capacity and the problem of the times at which an aircraft wants to come in and when it is not convenient to do so.

Mr. Spicer: I was not making any judgments about capacity. I take the point made by my hon. Friend, that there may be an opportunity to squeeze capacity into different times of the day and to generate new patterns of activity in the way that is suggested. All I would say is that, if the limit of capacity was ever reached, if there was a demand for certain times of day which were full up, it is at least conceivable that the scheduling committee approach would not be as effective as it is at present.

Mr. Steen: I would be grateful if my hon. Friend would give way before he goes further. The House is most grateful for his courtesy in giving way to his hon. Friends as often as he has done. This is a crucial point in the debate. My hon. Friend said that the time may come when the limit of capacity is reached. That is when the lifeboat picture emerges. What he is saying—is this right?—is that at the point when capacity is reached, either totally or in part, the Secretary of State will throw people out. The only people that he can throw out are British carriers, because of the bilateral agreements. That is what the House wants to know. Will he throw out British carriers?

Mr. Spicer: No. This is the question that I keep on throwing back at my hon. Friend. He throws these questions at me and I throw them back—perhaps I am not meant to do that. The question that I have been asking him is why that would be the case. He has proposed that we should enshrine the scheduling committee in legislation. Why should the safety and the future of British airlines be left more comfortably to a committee composed of a majority of large foreign airlines than to a British Secretary of State who is answerable to the House of Commons? My hon. Friend says that he has no powers. That is precisely what the debate is about. He will have reserve powers of the kind required by my hon. Friend.

The last three amendments consist of requirements to consult the scheduling committee before any action is taken. My case against these amendments is the same as that which I used against amendment No. 44, in particular. Not only would the arrangement be very cumbersome and give the scheduling committee a consultative role which other civil aviation interests might also wish to have, but there might be a time when the scheduling committee had actually broken down and consultations might be desired about the circumstances which had led to the breakdown of the scheduling committee. In such a case, it would surely not be particularly wise to have enshrined a consultative arrangement with an organisation which had broken down.

The Government accept, as my hon. Friend the Member for Brentwood and Ongar has asked us to, the tremendous efficiency and the tried and tested nature of the scheduling committee. There is no question about that. Nevertheless, I ask that the amendments be withdrawn or, if not, resisted, because we see grave disadvantages in enshrining in statute the role of the scheduling committee.

Mr. Snape: Hon. Members on both sides of the House have expressed understandable fears about the future of the smaller airlines and the existing network, particularly via Heathrow, but also via London's other airports. Despite the length of his reply, the Under-Secretary of State has conspicuously failed to allay those fears. His failure illustrates the central flaw in the Bill. The hon. Member for Cannock and Burntwood (Mr. Howarth) wants public sector protection in what will be a private sector industry, for which he will have voted. Having voted, as have all his hon. Friends, to take the British Airports Authority and the other airports into the private sector, he now seeks safeguards which will have an impact on the profitability of the airports. The problem is that he cannot have those safeguards, because to give them——

Mr. Bill Walker rose——

Mr. Snape: I will give way in a moment. I have not said anything yet. The hon. Gentleman has.

To give those safeguards would be contrary to the whole purpose of the Bill, which is to put those airports into the private sector because it is felt that they will be run more efficiently. If they are run more efficiently, the sufferers will inevitably be the smaller airlines operating smaller aircraft, which will be less attractive commercially to a privatised British Airports Authority.

Mr. Bill Walker: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the aviation industry is the most regulated of all, whether it is run by private or public sector airlines, and that there would be nothing odd in having a clause in the Bill which said that the British Airports Authority should not in future interrupt or prevent the work of the scheduling committee?

Mr. Snape: There might be nothing odd about it in the hon. Gentleman's view, or, for that matter, in mine, but it would be contrary to the spirit of the Bill and to the spirit which is typified by the Secretary of State for Transport.

Mr. Walker: No.

Mr. Snape: The hon. Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker) says no. If so, why has his hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State not accepted the perfectly reasonable new clause moved by the hon. Member for South Hams (Mr. Steen)? We are being asked by the Minister to put the whole matter into the hands of the Secretary of State, who has indicated his way forward.

The hon. Member for South Hams expressed concern about my hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeen, North (Mr. Hughes) being a future Secretary of State for Transport. I am sure that it was not me that he meant. It is not a role that I would seek. The fact is that both he and I know, because we voted against the Secretary of State's proposals in the Civil Aviation Bill which failed to get a sittings motion in Committee in December 1984, that that is the way in which the Secretary of State would presumably wish to go forward if the difficulties so amply illustrated by the hon. Member for South Hams were to come about.

I am afraid that the Minister has palpably failed to ease the fears of hon. Members on both sides of the House. It is for the hon. Member for South Hams to say what he is going to do. Again, the Minister grins. I will give one example which, if it does not appeal to the Minister, will appeal to his hon. Friend. Last week I flew to Gatwick from Exeter in a Twin Otter of Brymon Airways. Unlike some Conservative Members, I do not profess to be an aviation expert, but it was apparent that that aircraft, trying to land at Gatwick at about 8.20 in the morning, was causing a problem because of the mix of faster aircraft that were landing.

Mr. Bill Walker: On one runway.

Mr. Snape: Yes, on one runway.

We had to circle for about 10 minutes while faster aircraft landed. If Gatwick was run by a private authority, it might say to Brymon Airways, "It would be operationally easier for us if you postponed your flight for an hour." Brymon Airways is now supported by British Airways, but a few months ago it might have gone bankrupt while three or four such decisions were being examined by the Secretary of State. We all know how slow Governments are. I am not saying that the Secretary of State is slower than anyone else. It might be better if he was, because sometimes he is apt to jump the gun. By the time decisions are taken, smaller airlines may be bankrupt.

It is for the hon. Member for South Hams to decide whether he has received an adequate reply from the Minister. I do not think he has. He made a valid point, although I appreciate the concern expressed by my hon. Friend the Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours), that good intentions are not enough to ensure the future of the smaller private companies. The Minister has palpably failed to give the necessary assurance.

Mr. Peter Fry (Wellingborough): I apologise, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for not being here at the start of the debate, but I have been in the Select Committee on Transport. Hon. Members may recall that that Committee prepared a report, many of whose recommendations are the basis of this legislation.

I understand the concern of many of my hon. Friends about the possible dangers for civil airlines. Having listened to the hon. Member for West Bromwich, East (Mr. Snape), I am not clear whether he is in favour of the

[Mr. Peter Fry]

Secretary of State having power to make a decision in this case. Perhaps he was delicately drawing a veil over that so that we would not know exactly where he stood on it.

I support the Minister's point of view. When the Select Committee considered the position of airports in the post-privatisation period, we were aware that at the moment the wider public interest is protected by the Secretary of State and by the nationalised airports authority, and that the position created by the privatisation of airports could constitute a danger to the wider public interest. Although we were impressed by the representatives of the scheduling committee who explained its role to us, and although we were also impressed by and were sympathetic to the smaller airlines, the Select Committee felt that someone somewhere had to have responsibility for the public interest post-privatisation. Therefore, we took the view that it was up to the Secretary of State, in conjunction with the Civil Aviation Authority, to have discussions in the event of an airport being very near to saturation point.

Everyone must answer one simple question. Given that we will be in a new position, whether we like it or not, who should be the custodian of the public interest? I do not see a scheduling committee of airlines as being the appropriate body for that. In the circumstances we are talking about, with an airport rapidly becoming full up, the Secretary of State would not fulfil his proper duty if he did not have a responsibility and was not prepared to act. Therefore, although I have considerable sympathy with the purpose behind the amendment of my hon. Friend the Member for South Hams (Mr. Steen), I must support the Minister.

Mr. Steen: With the leave of the House, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I want to address myself to one or two matters which have come out of this important and interesting debate which has taken some time. It is right that it should have taken so much time because it is of great significance to the future of the airline industry. I have listened to the Minister with interest and the House has the greatest respect for his approach to the Bill, but he has missed one cardinal point. If an airline wants to fly into an airport when capacity is full, it must be told that it cannot or that somebody else will be displaced.

If there is a statutory scheduling committee, its word is final. It may say, "There is no more space. The slot is already taken. You must go elsewhere." The Bill will give the Secretary of State powers to remove someone who is already there. That is different from giving the final power to the scheduling committee, made up of the airlines, which will say, "We are full on Tuesday; come back on Wednesday," or "We are full on Tuesday; go somewhere else." In the Bill the Secretary of State is being given the power to move airlines around. He must use that power, otherwise there would be no point in giving it to him. But the key to the Bill is that the only people he can move around are British carriers. The Minister has said that it may not be foreign carriers because of international agreements.

If the scheduling committee has the final word, and the Secretary of State is not involved, all airlines, whether international or British carriers, will be treated equally. If the Secretary of State has reserve power, he can move only British airlines. Many hon. Members on both sides of the House fear that that is a deficiency in the Bill. It is with the greatest and deepest regret that I must tell my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State that his speech failed to address that problem. For that reason, I must push the new clause to a Division.

New Clause 7

PROVISION OF SERVICES AND FACILITIES

It shall be the duty of every person who is:—

(a) the successor company;

(b) a public airport company for the purposes of Part II of this Act; or

(c) the operator of an airport licensed for public use under an Air Navigation Order, to provide at each airport of which he is the operator such services and facilities (not being air navigation services) as are in his opinion necessary or desirable for its operation having regard to the development of air transport and to the efficiency, safety and economy of operation.'.—[Mr. Steen.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Steen: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): With this, it will be convenient to discuss the following: amendment (a) to new clause 7, in line 6, leave out 'in his opinion'.

New clause 9—Provision of new airport facilities—

'(1) In order to encourage provision of sufficient new airport facilities to meet demand, such facilities may be provided either by successor companies to the BAA or public airport companies as defined in Clause 15, or by other companies or organisations; and any such new facilities must have been approved in accordance with planning regulations and when necessary have received approval from the Secretary of State as suitable to provide necessary additional airport capacity in the national interest.

(2) The airport operator must provide fair and reasonable access to the runways, taxi-ways, roads, lands, safety services and other essential ancillary services at an airport, from all terminals and airport facilities serving that airport at a reasonable cost.

(3) In the event of a dispute between the airport operator and the provider of any such facility the Secretary of State will have the power to determine fair and reasonable access to the runways and other essential services.'.

Mr. Steen: We have already had a formidable debate on a matter of great public interest, but this issue is equally important. The new clause is designed to help the Government with a drafting difficulty that they are probably unaware of. It flows from the belief that if the Bill is left unamended, a new airport operator could build a housing estate there. A new operator could, indeed, sell off the land for agriculture or development, which is, I believe, inconsistent with running an airport. Clause 73(5) and part I of schedule 5 would revoke in its entirety the Airports Authority Act 1975. There is no provision in the Bill to replace the BAA's duty under section 2(2) of that Act to provide services and facilities for the airport's operation. In consequence, the successor company defined in clause 72(1) as being that is, the company in which the property, rights and liabilities of the BAA will vest — will be under no corresponding duty to provide services and facilities, and will be able to dispose of the land currently used for airports and runways for other, perhaps more lucrative, purposes.

I hope that the Government understand why we felt it our duty to prevent them being severely embarrassed upon finding that Heathrow or Gatwick had become private housing developments, hypermarkets, supermarkets or agricultural land. New clause 2 would impose on the successor company, on public airport companies to which municipal airports may be transferred, and on aerodromes licensed for public use under the air navigation order, an obligation to provide such services and facilities as are, in the opinion of the operator of the airport, necessary or desirable for its operation, having regard to the development of air transport, and to the efficiency, safety, and economy of operation. Those last few words are important. We are introducing criteria whereby that operation must be efficient, safe and economic. The important factor is that the airport operator is not obliged to apply for a licence for public use—that is, one that requires him to make the airport available, when it is in use, to all comers on equal terms—although if he does not do so, the CAA may refuse to grant him a licence for private use.

An aerodrome licence is required under the present Air Navigation Order 1985, part IX, Statutory Instrument No. 1643, for flights for the purpose of public transport—that is, for reward—or for instruction in flying. The concept of the licence for public use could be abolished by amending the air navigation order, subject to the negative resolution procedure.

The new clause is very interesting, and I am sure that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will be glad to have it in the Bill. He and his officials may not realise that the new airports authority—I know that my right hon. Friend will correct me if I am wrong—has said that, when Heathrow is privatised, it will buy up houses that are affected by noise. That is also true of Gatwick and other airports. Indeed, it is a credit to the Government that they have persuaded those people to be environmentally sensitive and to buy up houses that are adversely affected by noise. However, as a result of new stringent regulations and developments in air traffic noise, there is now, and will increasingly be, much less noise than years ago.

But once the airport authority has bought up the houses at a knockdown price because of the level of noise, it will have gone into the property market. It will buy houses around the airport, and if it is a good private concern, it will find that is is saddled with houses that are not commercially viable. Although it may sound far-fetched, as drafted, there is nothing in the Bill to prevent an airport authority deciding that the only way of dealing with a lot of loss-making houses on the outskirts of the airport and getting them back to a proper market value is by converting the whole or part of that airport into a private housing development, a supermarket or an office development. In that way, the houses would rise in value as the airport nuisance element receded.

I seek only to help the Government over a drafting deficiency. I hope that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will see it in that light. Of course, he may say that it is all very well dealing with hypotheses. Indeed, he may say that new clause 6 dealt with a hypothesis because airports are not yet full, and may never be. But the hypothesis in this case is that the power in the Bill would allow an authority to do something other than run an airport.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State may say that there would have to be a planning appeal before there was any change of use from an airport to a housing estate. That may be true, but what would happen if the new airport owners decided that a housing development was more lucrative, went to the planning department of a local council and was granted planning permission? There is no right of appeal, unless the Secretary of State believes that he can call it in.

The new clause is designed to help my right hon. Friend to ensure that airports are run as such. Moreover, and more importantly, it ensures that they will not be run casually, but with the specific aim of being efficient, effective, safe and economic. I hope that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will find much to commend in the new clause. However, if it is not drafted to his liking, I hope that he will feel that there is some advantage in including something similar in the Bill.

Mr. Toby Jessel (Twickenham): I hope that the House will decisively reject the new clause. It may be, as my hon. Friend the Member for South Hams (Mr. Steen) has suggested, that the housing point is uppermost in his mind, but it is not very likely that an airport authority would build a housing estate in the middle of an airport. However, the new clause could open the door to something far more sinister.

I invite the House to reconsider the text of new clause 7. It says:

> "It shall be the duty of every person who is . . .
> (c) the operator of an airport licensed for public use . . . to provide at each airport . . . such services and facilities . . . as are in his opinion necessary or desirable for its operation having regard to the development of air transport".

That would impose a duty on airport operators to meet the demand for unlimited expansion of an airport, or so it could be argued in a court of law. At Heathrow, that could, of course, include a fifth terminal. But I remind the House that, after a full debate on Monday 17 June 1985, the House voted decisively by 326 votes to 190 to endorse the decision of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment, which had been announced by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport on 5 June, to allow for a modest expansion of Stansted while refusing planning permission for a fifth terminal at Heathrow. Therefore, if the House were to accept this clause it could potentially drive a coach and horses through the previous decision of the House. I hope the clause will be rejected decisively.

Mr. McCrindle: I wish to speak to my amendment (a) which proposes to delete the words "in his opinion" from new clause 7. I agree with the broad thrust of new clause 7. I listened with great care to the points made by my hon. Friend the Member for South Hams (Mr. Steen) in moving the new clause. My objection to the new clause is that it is altogether too prone to accept what effectively the British Airports Authority is prepared to dole out. I point out as strongly as I can that the aim of my amendment is to establish real consultation between the providers and users of the services at airports. At present, under the new clause, there seems to be a considerable element of imposition of services at whatever level and to whatever degree the airports believe to be necessary.

Surely the airlines must be concerned with the number, level and quality of services provided. Surely it is not asking too much that the airlines, as the users of the facilities at airports, must be invited to have an input concerning the level of services that they believe are required to enable them to develop air transport. It is not good enough for the airports to provide only those services that the airport authority has decided, without formal consultation, are adequate for the purpose.

Ideally, there should be a partnership between airports and airlines in deciding the appropriate level of services. That presupposes that the terms of the partnership are laid down. As I said earlier, I am concerned that new clause 7, as the basis of that partnership, tends to impose the requirements at the level the airports decide. Because the airlines are, frankly, suspicious of the new regime to which we are now moving, the time has arrived, and the Bill gives the opportunity, to ensure that there is no doubt in anyone's mind that meaningful consultation is being sought.

Briefly, my amendment seeks to achieve the formalising of the consultative procedure. When the Bill was before the House on Second Reading, I intervened during the speech of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to intimate my concern that the consultation process provided for was perhaps a little too informal. He may recall that he said then that it did not matter too much to him whether it was formal or informal. With the greatest respect, I think that it does matter, and my amendment provides the opportunity for a rather more formalised basis of consultation. I commend it to the House and to the Secretary of State for consideration.

Mr. Bill Walker: I will concentrate on new clause 9, which stands in my name and that of my hon. Friends and which deals with the provision of new airport facilities.

It is no secret that, once the British Airports Authority is in the private sector—and I heartily approve of that—it will no longer be under any statutory duty to meet demands. The first responsibility of the private airport owners will properly be to their shareholders, and I do not argue with that. In a private monopoly—that is what they will be—the shareholders' interests may best be served and the risk to shareholders' funds minimised, in the absence of any threat of competition, by not providing additional capacity until the demand clearly exceeds existing facilities; in other words, action will be delayed until it must be taken. The airport owners, by meeting the shareholders' interests—the interests of the consumers and the aircraft industry—might be compromised and the competitive position of the United Kingdom weakened.

On the matter of competition, I have been motivated by the thinking and writing of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. Therefore, on this subject, I would expect him to understand clearly what I am saying. If new clause 9 were accepted it would enable companies, other that the airport owner, to provide facilities to meet demand on conditions that allowed the companies fair and reasonable access to the essential facilities of airports, such as runways. The provision of terminal facilities, for example, other than by airport owners works well and efficiently in the United States, and this applies to the British Airways—owned and operated terminal at John F. Kennedy airport in New York.

My right hon. Friend will remember the morning when I was delayed in Washington and unfortunately was not able to hear what he said in relation to British Airways and its operations at its New York terminal. He will recollect that, on Tuesday 28 January, he said that British Airways had not particularly enjoyed having its own terminal at JFK in New York. My right hon. Friend will know that British Airways disputes that; it says that it places great value on having its own terminal at this major airport. It enables it to handle arrivals and departures flexibly. It helps it to provide a better service to customers.

The facilities have recently been modernised, and passengers are benefiting and staff enjoy working in them. The marketing of the British Airways product in the United States is in keeping with the refurbishing cost of $16 million. The terminal has assisted British Airways to get its message across in the United States. The main competitors of British Airways in New York are Pan American and Trans World Airways and they also operate services from their own terminals and extensively advertise the convenience that this affords.

My right hon. Friend will also be aware that at many other airports in the United States as well as John F. Kennedy there is a similar situation. It was suggested in Committee that the New York airport authority would, at this stage, not be happy about airlines having their own terminals. I was surprised when I read those comments. I was not present when they were made, so I checked the situation myself. There is no doubt that the present policy of the New York authority is to encourage airlines to finance the terminal facilities at its airports, which include all the airports covered by the New York authority. However, the present director of the authority may have personal views not in keeping with the policy that the authority is exercising.

Mr. Stephen Ross: As a member of the Select Committee, I went to all three of the airports in New York run by the authority. The impression given to the Select Committee was that the authority would not go down that path again.

Mr. Walker: I am not questioning that; I am saying that I have subsequently checked the statements made. The report I have from the New York authority is that its policy is to lease out terminals and terminal facilities. It has recently awarded new leases to airlines, one of which is the British Airports Authority, which has just had its lease renegotiated. That is the current policy of the airport authority. It also says that Pan Am did its own financing and TWA sub-leased back from Pan Am. In addition, British Airways, United Airlines, American Airlines, Eastern Airlines, and North West Orient all do their own financing. That happens at JFK airport. At La Guardia, which is also an airport authority airport, Delta Airlines has recently financed a new terminal. At Atlanta the same situation applies.

I will not bore the House with all the details, but I have them in relation to all the major airports in the United States, and the information shows clearly that in places such as Los Angeles, which I understand my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary visited, new terminals are operated by a consortium of international airlines. A United Airlines terminal is privately financed. Terminal 1 is financed by Lockheed. There is no question but that the major airports of the United States and the world's busiest airport—Chicago—have terminals run by private funds, most of which come from airlines. There are key examples of airlines being committed to managing their facilities and often providing their own finance. Their success can be seen by the fact that others have been encouraged to follow suit.

All the major airports in the United States do this. The benefits are there for everyone to see. The economies which are the natural result of private enterprise produce action. Government expense is reduced and operating efficiency is improved. No deterioration in airline access has occurred. In fact, the opposite has happened. There has been a proliferation of new airlines in the United States. I am sure that when the Select Committee was over there, it was impressed. Under deregulation, there has been an enormous expansion in new airlines and not one new carrier has failed to gain access to a suitable terminal at major airports.

Mr. Fry: Can my hon. Friend tell us how many British airlines have told him that they would like to build their own terminal?

8 pm

Mr. Walker: I cannot comment on these matters, as they may be regarded as confidential, but I can say that more than one has expressed an interest. I hope that my hon. Friend now realises that airlines are interested in being associated with and involved in the construction and running of airline terminals. I am not authorised by the airlines to say more. Airlines would wish to operate terminals if the facilities were not provided. They would build terminals, not for the sake of it, but only if it would help them run their businesses.

In Committee, there was some comment about British Airways not knowing how to run the terminal, and asking the British Airports Authority for advice. I am sure that my right hon. Friend will agree that that is not true. A senior member of British Airways invited British Airports Authority involvement in one aspect of the operation of the new terminal at John F. Kennedy airport. It is sensible to seek help from an expert.

On the matter of the 17 cargo sheds at Heathrow, it was suggested in Committee that British Airways had prevented others from having access to the sheds. British Airways had only one of the cargo sheds—all the others were leased by other airlines. There is no question of one airline adopting a dog-in-the-manger attitude. The British Airports Authority had to build another cargo shed, but that is no reason for rejecting the new clause. The airlines will build a terminal or other facility only if they believe they need it and can make it work cost-effectively and profitably. They do not build for the sake of it.

Additional facilities must be provided. We must consider whether the British Airports Authority, after it is privatised, feels that there is a need, particularly at Heathrow and Gatwick, where there will be enormous pressure. The easy option is to divert traffic to Stansted. If that happens, the new clause is necessary, so that airlines, or anyone else who wishes, can provide new facilities such as terminal facilities to meet demand. That would be helpful and would remove the present monopoly.

My right hon. Friend believes in competition and will, I am sure, see the advantages of new clause 9. It will galvanise the airport owner to provide sufficient capacity in time. As I have always argued when we debate air traffic navigation orders, there would have been proper consultation if the House had had the opportunity to pray against those orders. The right to pray against them would create the conditions in which consultations would be effective. Airport owners are required by statute to provide sufficient capacity, but, after privatisation, the Government will have no control over the new owner's capital spending. Without new clause 9, the Government's ability to influence capacity provision will be much reduced. I hope that my right hon. Friend will accept the new clause because it will help us to provide the necessary facilities in time.

Mr. Adley: My hon. Friend the Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker) has a slightly rosy view of the Bill.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State believes in competition, but not if extra competition interferes with the maximisation of revenue for the Treasury from the privatisation of the BAA. That is one of the problems that lie at the heart of the Bill.

There are three views of the Bill, two of which are dogmatic. We have the Opposition's view that public ownership is the answer to everything, and we have my right hon. Friend's view that unrestrained private trading is the only solution for the nation's problems, provided of course that we do not allow too much competition, which would reduce the value of the product that we are selling off. The new clauses in this group tend to reflect the views of some of us who support the proposition, but worried about some of the details.

In the previous debate the hon. Member for West Bromwich, East (Mr. Snape) suggested to my hon. Friend the Member for Cannock and Burntwood (Mr. Howarth) that there was incompatibility between a legislative framework and a private sector company with public sector responsibilities created by such a framework. I utterly reject that view. Anyone who has read the history of the Great Western Railway knows that it is perfectly possible to have a company in the private sector which is heavily encompassed with public sector responsibilities laid on it by the House.

I shall support the new clauses, partly because of the duty-free shops at our airports. They seem to be virtually a licence to print money. When I go through Heathrow and buy perfumes for my wife, I find that the prices there are about the same as those at Fortnum and Mason.

Mr. Couchman: Does my hon. Friend shop there?

Mr. Adley: Yes.

If my right hon. Friend is not willing to accept the new clauses or the amendment, I hope that he will consider sympathetically in another place the proposition that it is desirable to encourage a little more competition, even if we may have to accept a slightly lower price for the privatisation of the BAA.

Mr. James Hill (Southampton, Test): We all know that poorly drafted legislation can create a bonus for the legal profession. It worries me that, if my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State accepts new clause 9, an impression, which the barristers would be only too pleased to argue from now to domesday, would be created. I do not fully understand the phrase

"airport capacity in the national interest."

That will be a difficult concept to argue. The new clause states:

"The airport operator must provide fair and reasonable access."

He is in the business of providing access to runways. As everyone who has been in the airline business will know, he probably provides more access to runways than he does to duty-free shops. The airport operator must not only provide fair and reasonable access to runways, but all these extra facilities must be provided at a reasonable cost. That may lead to a vast argument between the operators and the private owner of the airport.

The penultimate line shows that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State

"will have the power to determine fair and reasonable access to the runways."

That will be terribly difficult to define.

I hesitate not to support the new clause. My hon. Friend's heart is in the right place. He wants privatisation, but he wants it to be hedged with many minor regulations. The free port of Southampton is an example of how regulations can destroy almost anything. I shall be extremely interested to hear what my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has to say, but the new clause is too woolly for the House——

Mr. Bill Walker: I trust that my hon. Friend has read the Bill carefully. He must realise that parts of the new clause are taken from the Bill. If it is too woolly and couched in the wrong language, something must be fundamentally wrong with the Bill. Had my hon. Friend followed our earlier debates and understood what was meant by reasonable access to runways and other essential facilities, he would know that we were talking about aircraft being told to taxi from new terminals over taxiways to runways. If we built a new terminal at Heathrow, there would be no guarantee of access to the taxiways and runways.

Mr. Hill: I sometimes listen to my hon. Friends with wonder. The development of terminal 4 at Heathrow has meant that crossing over to active runways will be one of the most hazardous activities for pilots. Fair and reasonable access to runways is not always provided. That is a matter for the operator of the airport. It is not for my right hon. Friend to provide an inspectorate to make daily checks on large firms to see whether they provide fair and reasonable access. In practical terms, that will not work.

Whatever one may say about "a reasonable cost", which my hon. Friend did not mention, I must point out that anyone's figure could be a reasonable figure of cost. The barristers will love new clause 9, if it is accepted, because they will argue for ever more about every decision that the Secretary of State or an airport operator makes.

Mr. Alan Haselhurst (Saffron Walden): I wish to speak briefly, more in the spirit of my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch (Mr. Adley) than in the narrow legalistic sense of my hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Test (Mr. Hill). My hon. Friend the Member for Test was a little less than fair. We have been discussing the broad spirit of some principles of the Bill. Conservative Members are amateur draftsmen. Their amendments and new clauses are proposed as a vehicle for ideas which we commend to the Secretary of State. If the Secretary of State is impressed by those ideas, he may wish to put his draftsmen to work to ensure that they are properly encapsulated in the Bill.

My main point is that the Bill provides considerable powers for the British Airports Authority and it is not unreasonable that it should have duties placed upon it and that there should be every protection for people who may wish to have access to the facilities that we are delivering over to a private body—the British Airports Authority—after the Bill has reached the statute book.

Therefore, I do not dismiss entirely the importance of new clause 7, although I would not go as far as my hon. Friend the Member for South Hams (Mr. Steen) in supposing what could happen. It is reasonable to assume that the operators of Heathrow or Gatwick could, within present planning regulations, have the freedom to build two or three warehouses without their coming within the criteria for being called in, as the criteria have generally been operated until now. Of course, it may be fanciful to suggest that they would operate that freedom wildly and irresponsibly, but it is possible and we are here to ensure that there is proper protection. Therefore, it is reasonable to place a duty on the operators of the airports that we are handing over to the private sector to provide the services that are an essential part of an airport.

8.15 pm

On possible competition—this may cause my hon. Friend the Member for Twickenham (Mr. Jessel) to jump up and down in great excitement, but I say it purely illustratively—it is well known that a private consortium exists which would be interested in developing the Perry Oaks site at Heathrow. If that body were not the British Airports Authority, it could build a terminal without planning permission, but it would never obtain the agreement of the BAA, as the owner of Heathrow and its runways, to have access to those runways. It is reasonable to expect an opening to be retained in the statute should that happen, whether at Heathrow or anywhere else. It should be possible for a competitive operator of a terminal not to be squeezed out simply because the owner of the runways says, "I will not have you at my airport." I hope that my right hon. Friend will not cast that consideration aside. There must be no danger of excluding that possibility of competition.

Mr. Fry: My hon. Friend the Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker) quoted extensively from experience in the United States. The Select Committee discovered, when it visited the United States and investigated the matter, that much of the ownership of terminals is associated with the hub principle of American airlines. Large American airlines use specific cities. In Atlanta, for example, Eastern and Delta own the two terminals, and it is accepted as their territory. I am sure that, despite what he said, my hon. Friend would not deny the enormous advantage that that gives to the airlines which use that hub. That would be a major departure in Britain. I remind him that British Airways has not been given exclusive use of terminal 4 at Heathrow——

Mr. Dicks: Shame.

Mr. Fry: That may be, but as a matter of policy that is the decision.

I have some sympathy with my hon. Friend the Member for Tayside, North when I consider Glasgow. Glasgow airport is interesting because it has no freight facilities. If Glasgow and Prestwick were not under the same ownership, one wonders whether Glasgow would continue to have no freight facilities. If it did, there might be an end to Prestwick. There is some merit in my hon. Friend's proposals and some points for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to consider.

After listening to some of the speeches of my hon. Friends, I begin to wonder how far they want to whittle down the value of the BAA before we sell it. My hon. Friend the member for Christchurch (Mr. Adley) said tht fewer duty-free articles should be sold. Does he realise how much of the revenue of the BAA comes from duty-free goods? If we abolished duty-free goods and made it difficult to make large profits from that source, the airlines would complain about increased landing charges.

Mr. Adley: They would be happier on safety grounds.

Mr. Fry: Perhaps, but there would be complaints.

There would be difficulties with foreign countries and airlines. We should not under-estimate the contributions that duty-free shops and other franchises make to the finances of the BAA.

Mr. Adley: If my hon. Friend talked to representatives of the airlines, he would find that they would be delighted to have the opportunity to fly without having to carry large quantities of highly explosive alcohol on board for their customers. As the Bill stands, without any seeming control there is the danger that what happens in my constituency could happen at BAA airports. For example, Hurn airport is operated by the airport management committee, without any regard to Christchurch council as the planning authority. In planning use terms, the committee allowed factories, which were previously owned by British Aerospace for the purpose of building aeroplanes, to be converted into warehouses for storing EEC grain. That change of use took place without any application to the planning authority. That is an example of the sort of thing that is worrying us.

Mr. Fry: If I read the wording of the new clause correctly, it would be necessary for planning approval to be given for someone to build a terminal. In such circumstances, can one imagine some local authorities being happy to give planning permission? I do not know whether that would be in the interests of the airport as a whole or of the airport users. I am commenting on the way in which the clause has been presented.

If we continue to whittle away the saleable value of the authority, we shall not realise anything like the amount that has been expected. I understand the worries of my hon. Friends, but the sum that will be realised is already somewhat lower than was expected originally. I believe that the Government are right to say that they want to offer to the public—to those who wish to buy shares—something of comparable value to what had been expected. If we continue to pass amendments or new clauses that reduce the value of the authority, we shall defeat one of our main purposes.

Mr. Haselhurst: Does my hon. Friend believe that our main objective should be to achieve the maximum value for the authority or to ensure that we create a regime that is in the interests of British civil aviation?

Mr. Fry: Naturally, I think that our priority should be the latter. One can go only so far in that direction. If we continue to bring up ideas, such as those which are canvassed in new clause 9, anyone who obtains planning permission will be able to do virtually anything and have automatic access to an airport.

Mr. Bill Walker: My hon. Friend is being unrealistic if he believes that there are people throughout the world who are determined to build terminals or any other facilities without being absolutely sure that they will obtain a return for their money. Those who will be interested are hard-nosed speculators and investors. We know that airlines are having some difficulty nowadays in making profits and there will be a wish to ensure that what they are doing is necessary and will provide a return. If I may say so, I find my hon. Friend's frivolous approach to serious matters rather disturbing.

Mr. Fry: On the contrary, my approach is not frivolous. Has my hon. Friend not seen large office blocks in our cities standing empty? Many of those blocks remain empty for a long time after erection. If it is assumed that there is a great deal of money to be made from the development of airports, some people will develop them. However, the developments will not necessarily be utilised immediately. I assure my hon. Friend that my approach is not frivolous.

Mr. Wilkinson: I should like to reinforce the arguments advanced by my hon. Friends the Members for Saffron Walden (Mr. Haselhurst) and for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker). The concern of many of my hon. Friends is that the long-term economic potential benefit which could accrue to Britain through the fullest use of its civil air transport infrastructure — airports and associated facilities—should not be diminished by its development for other purposes for short-term financial gain.

Mr. Fry: I do not deny that. I am saying that new clause 9 would not achieve what my hon. Friend wants. I think that I have spent more time responding to interventions than in proceeding with my speech.

I understand the concerns that have been expressed. The new clause has provided a vehicle for the expression of those concerns, and I hope that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will respond to them. However, I do not feel that I can support the new clauses. As I said in responding to the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Twickenham (Mr. Jessel), I believe that amendment (a), tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Brentwood and Ongar (Mr. McCrindle), would make matters worse. It would put an onus upon any airport owner to extend an airport if there were any demand for extra use. That would be an exceedingly dangerous line to follow.

I am aware that we are trying to create a framework for airports that is in the national interest, and we must decide who is the best custodian of the national interest. In the last resort, I believe that responsibility must lie with the Secretary of State. I cannot, therefore, support the new clause.

Mr. Robert Hughes: I hesitated before deciding to intervene in the debate. There has been a family argument among Conservative Members, and some of their interventions have been astonishing when one remembers that they all trooped into the Aye Lobby to support the Bill's Second Reading. They were enthusiastic in their support of a measure to privatise the BAA. Yet all that we have heard throughout the evening has been one Doubting Thomas after another describing the fragility of the entire exercise and arguing that a private company cannot be trusted to do the job which the Secretary of State seeks to allow it to do.

Mr. Dicks: With great respect, the hon. Gentleman's description of the debate is a travesty. On Second Reading many of us expressed concern and great doubt about the BAA's ability to do anything right. To suggest that Conservative Members who supported the principle of privatisation walked through the Aye Lobby on Second Reading while supporting the authority's activities is a travesty of what took place on that occasion.

Mr. Hughes: I absorb the hon. Gentleman's intervention. I absolve him from my general accusation that Tory Members walked through the Aye Lobby enthusiastically on Second Reading. I accept that he was dragged through the Lobby kicking and screaming by the Whips.

The principle of the privatisation of the BAA, as enshrined in the Bill, has been challenged by every hon. Member who has spoken in the many debates that have taken place this evening. The hon. Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker) has the greatest suspicion that the new owner—he was not speaking about the management and we do not know who the new owner will be—of the BAA will allow terminal capacity to drag against demand to such an extent that it will allow a competitor to move in and provide facilities. Other Conservative Members say that the problem is to ensure competition and that the operation must be directed to the maximising of profits while responding to the public interest.

Terminals make money because, while waiting to join their flights, passengers use the franchise shops and duty-free shops. No money is made merely by passengers passing through terminals in the course of joining their flights. No money is to be made merely by providing runways, taxiways and shelters for those boarding aircraft or disembarking from them. Conservative Members are realising more and more that the Bill is nonsense.

If the subsequent owners of the BAA airports or local authority airports are to maximise profits, they will do so only by concentrating on non-landing charges. They will provide terminals as and when there is perceived demand. They will not start to build a terminal with the unlikely prospect that in 10 years more people will be using the airport. They will look to capacity, demand and projections. If we go through the procedure of a public inquiry — no one suggests that the public inquiry procedure should be dropped — it will take about 15 years from deciding to build a new terminal to its being in operation. The time scale might be a little shorter.

Neither of the new clauses will make any difference to what will happen in the future. I accept that they have been put forward to float ideas. The ideas have been floated, and in my view they have sunk.

8.30 pm

Mr. Ridley: The two new clauses are slightly different in content and I shall discuss them separately. I should like to pick up the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Test (Mr. Hill) who, quite professionally, destroyed the drafting of new clause 9. My hon. Friend the Member for Saffron Walden (Mr. Haselhurst) quite correctly said that it is not the drafting we are worried about but the principle. That may be perfectly right in relation to new clause 9 but the drafting of new clause 7, which my hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Test could also have dealt with, leaves more than detail to be cured by the skill of the draftsman. It exposes the very difficulties which my hon. Friend the Member for South Hams (Mr. Steen) is encountering. They are not drafting difficulties, but difficulties of substance. Although my hon. Friend the Member for South Hams makes a brave attempt to impose a duty on airport operators to provide capacity and adequate services, he has no means of saying how much capacity or how adequate the services should be. We cannot ride out of that difficulty on the skill of the draftsman.

Looking at the practicality of the duty which my hon. Friend the Member for South Hams wishes to put on airport operators, its fulfilment may not be within an airport operator's power. He may be unable to obtain planning permission for a development which he considers necessary, or he may be unable to obtain finance for a new facility which he considers necessary.

How is a breach of such a duty to be judged? There are no objective criteria for the courts to apply. What sanctions could be applied? One could not have a court requiring a certain extra terminal to be built as part of the judgment as to whether the law that my hon. Friend proposes has been complied with. I shall take the notorious example of Stansted. I happen to believe that a limited expansion at Stansted is necessary. My hon. Friend the Member for Saffron Walden has consistently and courageously fought the opposite case — that no development, or much less development, was needed at Stansted. Will the dispute between us be arbitrated by a court? It is not a proposition that my hon. Friend the Member for South Hams could believe to be correct.

Mr. Haselhurst: I cannot let that aside go without comment. I have always argued in favour of limited expansion at Stansted. The argument has been about the degree.

Mr. Ridley: I accept that. The question is how limited is limited. We have a different view of the word. I cite that only as an example of how difficult it is to decide what capacity is necessary and to show that this is not a justiciable matter.

The new clause contains the phrase "in his opinion" —that is, the opinion of the operator. If we are to rely on his opinion he will always say, "Yes, it is my opinion that I have provided enough capacity." If we accept the amendment to new clause 7 of my hon. Friend the Member for Brentwood and Ongar (Mr. McCrindle) so that we cut out the words "in his opinion", it makes it more difficult for the court to interpret. There will not then be anybody's opinion, so the court will simply have to interpret whether adequate capacity or services are provided in vacuo, and without any guidance.

Mr. Robert Hughes: Why does the Secretary of State take such objection to the words "in his opinion" when the Bill is littered with his own phrase "as he thinks fit"?

Mr. Ridley: The hon. Gentleman may or may not be a lawyer; I do not know. He must realise that if I am in a court of law, all I have to do is say, "In my opinion, I did not steal the hon. Gentleman's wallet," if the charge is that I have stolen the hon. Gentleman's wallet and it is accepted that it is a matter of opinion whether the wallet was stolen. It is a very easy defence to say, "In my opinion, I did not steal the wallet." That is why those words are important.

My hon. Friend the Member for South Hams was concerned not so much about the failure to provide sufficient capacity as about the extreme case of an airport operator who decided to convert the airport to other uses such as housing. The answer was in his own speech. A change of use would require planning permission and it is not enough to suggest that the planning authority could simply grant it, as happened in the case mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch (Mr. Adley). If it was proposed to convert an airport to housing or any other non-airport purpose, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment might wish to call in the planning application and consider it in relation to airline policy.

I am not saying that he would do so in all cases, because some airports are tiny and not used at all, or very little. Clearly in such cases it would be right for those airports to be put to other uses. However, in the case of any sizeable or major airport I have no doubt that that would be the defence that would ultimately be open to the Government. If an airline operator were to buy houses surrounding an airport and claim that the houses would increase in value if the noise was stopped, that would be a strange plea for planning permission and could certainly be the subject of a call-in in the way that I have described.

My hon. Friend the Member for Brentwood and Ongar returned to the point about the need for consultation. I think that the Bill is littered with instances where airport operators have to consult and I think that he will find one or two more in the amendments before us tonight. It is difficult to think of other places in the Bill where requirements to consult could be placed. I think that the debate on the scheduling committees illustrated the extent to which the airlines, even if they are not consulted, make their views absolutely clear and well known to the airport operators. Therefore, I hope that my hon. Friend will not feel that we have neglected that.

My hon. Friend the Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker) tabled new clause 9. The belief which expressed itself in the debate on new clause 7 came through in new clause 9 — that it is possible that the BAA will not provide adequate capacity at some stage in some airport. New clause 9 seeks to allow airlines or others to provide extra terminal capacity, subject to them obtaining planning permission.

I promised to look at that again because I believe in competition as much as my hon. Friends have been kind enough to acknowledge. I wanted to ensure that we missed nothing. I said in Committee that I thought there was a one in a thousand million chance that it might be possible that an airport would be short of capacity, would refuse to build more and would seek to deny an airline or another developer the opportunity to provide that extra capacity. However, I do not believe that such an example of an airport deliberately starving itself of capacity is likely to occur. There are some reasons in the Bill for thinking that. I shall give one or two reasons why I do not believe that what is proposed would be the right solution, even if that were the case.

In clause 36 (2) there is a duty on the Civil Aviation Authority, while conducting its economic regulation, to encourage investment and make sure that the financing of investment is allowed for in price regulation. Secondly, it is very much in any airport operator's interest to seek to maximise traffic. If we are to get the profit motive into airports through the Bill at all, the way in which extra profits will be made, particularly with economic regulation, is partly through reduction of costs, but mainly through increase of throughput.

Every passenger who is contented, has enough space in the terminal, is not jostled, does not have to queue, and can sit down, will be likely to spend a little more in the shops. That is the way in which extra revenue will come to the airport operator. Therefore, deliberately to cramp, deny or restrict the space provided is deliberately to restrict one's own profits. For those reasons, it is almost unthinkable that anybody would deliberately produce less capacity than was humanly possible.

I must give my hon. Friend the Member for Tayside, North the reason why I wonder whether it is a proper solution to give powers to other airlines or consortia to build extra terminals in defiance of an airport operator's wish. I think that the whole House will agree with me that if an airline or another operator agreed with the airport operator that extra terminal capacity would be provided, not by the airport operator but by somebody else, that would be ideal. That is what has happened in New York, as my hon. Friend knows. As a policy, the port authority there has agreed with other airlines that they should build their own terminal capacity. That is excellent. I hope that it happens here. However, there is not so much space here for every airline to have its own terminal as there is in airports abroad.

For example, if—it is a big "if"—British Airways were to build terminal 5 at Heathrow, after the problem of the sludge works had been conquered, and it provided terminal capacity for 15 million passengers per annum, presumably it would move out of terminal 4, leaving it virtually empty, with just the Dutch airlines and Air Malta there. Even if other airlines moved into terminal 4, they would leave a gap wherever they moved from. Therefore, there would be an inefficient and uneconomic use of the scarce facilities at Heathrow, where there is a limitation on space. Half the space would be taken up by terminals that were not full.

I owe British Airways an apology about the cargo sheds. There are 17 cargo sheds, which were not, as I said in Committee, all taken by British Airways; they were taken by airlines of all sorts. The point remains valid, however, that when British Caledonian wished to have a cargo shed at Heathrow, although there was plenty of spare capacity in those 17 cargo sheds, not one airline was prepared to make the necessary arrangement to accommodate British Caledonian, so another cargo shed had to be built. That is an illustration, on the cargo side, of the same point that I was making about terminals.

Mr. Wilkinson: Will not my right hon. Friend reconsider his somewhat unnecessarily negative statement about terminal 5 and the Perry Oaks site? Is not the important aspect of the matter the fact that there should be no inhibition on the potential development by the airport operator of such a valuable site for terminal facilities that might be desired by the airlines? For commercial reasons, the airport operator could have other intentions for the site, such as a waterfowl park. Is not what my right hon. Friend said much too negative? The development of a fifth terminal at Heathrow could not become a commercial proposition until there was sufficient demand by the air transport operators, who would be able to move in and fully occupy those facilities.

8.45 pm

Mr. Ridley: I have the greatest respect for my hon. Friend, but for once he is not right. If British Airways moved into a new terminal 5 and filled it, it would leave an enormous vacuum in the other terminals. The airport operator would have to forgo the rent for them, so that it would lose a lot of money, or other airlines would have to be surcharged to cover the cost of the empty space at the other terminals. That would not be at all fair on the other airlines.

It is worse than that. Supposing that the constraint on capacity at Heathrow is the runways—as I have always said—not terminal capacity, and supposing suddenly capacity for an extra 15 million passengers was provided at terminal 5, British Airways would say: "I shall put more flights through my terminal 5. Will you please chuck some of these people out of the lifeboat because I have a terminal. I do not care about the others. I shall monopolise the runway capacity." Out of the lifeboat would go all my hon. Friends who support the small airlines, which I too support. Therefore, there is a real risk. I hope that no one will take offence, least of all British Airways, because I have used it as an example to illustrate my point. I am sure that BA would not behave like that.

The policy of allowing extra terminal capacity at the will of an airline could severely disadvantage other airlines. As we are seeking to make airports open for all, without discrimination or favour, I believe that there are some fairly strong reasons why it would be better not to do that.

Mr. Bill Walker: My right hon. Friend is touching on a fundamental and important point. Let us consider the very fact that the site at Perry Oaks exists and that there will be a need to redevelop the central area of Heathrow. At some time there will be inadequate terminal capacity because of the need to redevelop the central area. That is what we have in mind. My right hon. Friend has grasped many of the nettles. The problem has been that Governments have refused to face up to the problems of looking ahead, in aviation policy. I believe that the development of our prime airport is one of those things. That is why it is necessary for there to be at least an opportunity for private capital to help the development.

Mr. Ridley: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. It would be useful if an opportunity could be found to redevelop the central area of Heathrow.

Extra terminal capacity might be required while it was being done. It is within the capability of the BAA successor company, in conjunction with the airlines, and with private capital, to do that by agreement, but my hon. Friend is seeking to give the airlines a right to do it in the absence of agreement with the airport operator. That would lead to the evils that I have just described. I would encourage and welcome co-operation between all concerned in providing the capacity that is thought to be necessary, but there should not be conflict leading to discrimination or favour.

Mr. Dicks: The weight of my right hon. Friend's argument would be increased if most Conservative Members were not aware of the fact that the BAA is determined to see Stansted advanced, at whatever cost. Therefore, there would not be fairness and compromise over the decision on the development of terminal 5 at Perry Oaks. There would be a feeling among the airlines and many people that the BAA is biased, as perhaps my right hon. Friend is, with respect, in favour of Stansted. Does not my right hon. Friend agree that the role of the airport operator is to give the airlines the facilities at an airport so that they can provide a service for their customers?

Mr. Ridley: I agree entirely with my hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington (Mr. Dicks) on his second point, but I found his first point confusing. My hon. Friends have expressed concern that insufficient capacity will be provided and that something should be written into the Bill to force airport operators to provide as much capacity as is necessary. When the airport operators have tried to do so at Stansted the same hon. Friends have been extremely alarmed. My hon. Friends cannot have it both ways. They would like to decide where and when capacity is reached, but the British Airports Authority has been trying to provide the extra capacity that is needed. Yet my hon. Friends have sought to criticise the authority for not doing that.

Mr. Jessel: My right hon. Friend said that the main limiting factor at Heathrow is the limitation capacity on runways. I would also ask him to consider that the highway capacity on the approach roads could become increasingly relevant. Despite the tremendous benefits conferred around London by the M25, that motorway already shows signs of being highly congested at peak hours. The A4 out of central London is also congested. Therefore one cannot go on for ever expanding capacity at Heathrow.

Mr. Ridley: I congratulate my hon. Friend on getting in a well deserved plug for extra infrastructure at Heathrow during a Bill which deals with aeroplanes rather than other forms of transport. My hon. Friend will be aware that we are deep into a study on how to improve access to Heathrow, though the report is not yet ready.

I do not consider that these amendments are necessary, although I have much sympathy with both the new clauses. When one comes to try to devise a statute, which we are now making, which holds up to the type of examination that the House would like to expose it to, I think one would find the amendments would be difficult to incorporate in a way that would improve the Bill. I think we have got it right and I hope my hon. Friends will not feel that they wish to press the new clauses.

Mr. Steen: With the leave of the House.

I am always moved when I hear the Secretary of State, because he is extremely persuasive and he puts his case very nicely. I feel sure that new clause 7 will not go well in the Bill if my right hon. Friend says that it will not do so. We have disagreed only on where the Okehampton bypass should go. My right hon. Friend wanted it to go south, and I wanted it to go north. I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): Does the hon. Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker) wish to have a Division on new clause 9?

Mr. Bill Walker: With the leave of the House, I wish to——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman has had his say. If he wants a Division, he should move the new clause formally. If not, there is nothing more to be said.

Clause 1

POWER TO DIRECT REORGANISATION OF BAA'S UNDERTAKING PRIOR TO APPOINTED DAY

Mr. Alfred Morris (Manchester, Wythenshawe): I beg to move amendment No. 1, in page 1, line 14, at end insert—

'Provided that such proposals shall make provision for Stansted Airport to be operated as an independent free-standing company.'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take the following amendments: No. 2, in page 2, line 17, at end insert—

'Provided that the Secretary of State shall not approve proposals in relation to Stansted Airport unless they provide for its operation as an independent free-standing company.'.

No. 3, in line 17, at end insert—

'(3A) The Secretary of State shall not approve proposals under subsection (3) if any company so nominated owns more than one airport serving the same area as defined by section 28(6) except that, for the purposes of this section, airports operating in Scotland shall not be regarded as serving the same area.'.

Mr. Morris: With very many others, I am most grateful to Mr. Speaker for selecting these important amendments. They have been signed by scores of hon. and right hon. Members from all parties and from every part of Great Britain over and above those whose names have appeared on the Amendment Paper today.

For several years Members from both sides of the House have fought long and hard to impress upon the Government the importance of Britain's airports outside the south-east. We did so not simply because of the stimulus that they bring to ailing regional economies in the regions devastated by unemployment, but also in the national interest, because of the way in which they can, given the growth of which they are capable, relieve pressure on the overburdened London airports.

Our demands were simple. We urged rejection of a massive expansion of Stansted airport. The decision to develop that airport to 15 million passengers per annum rising to 25 million passengers per annum was neither necessary nor desirable. We also urged the development of a coherent airport policy which would enable the regional airports to compete on equal terms with the London airports. Here I must emphasise that this did not, as some argued, involve the forced diversion of passengers.

What it required was a positive effort, first, to liberalise the network and make it easier for airlines to be allowed to operate direct to and from regions outside the south-east, and, secondly, to eliminate subsidy to Stansted. These demands were demonstrably reasonable. The Government endorsed them and, indeed, much to the credit of the all-party North of England Regional Consortium, they now form major tenets of Government policy, as explained in the 1985 White Paper.

The elimination of subsidy to Stansted is vital to airports outside the south-east. They have to operate as free-standing entities. Their charges have to reflect the cost of operating and developing their facilities. Stansted, on the other hand, is not subject to such disciplines. Charges at Stansted have been consistently low for some time, and are at their comparatively low level solely to attract traffic. In fact, charges at Stansted are, on average, four times lower than those employed at major airports like Manchester, Birmingham and Luton.

The Secretary of State suggested last year that he understood our concern. He promised that arrangements would be made to eliminate subsidy, so that if Stansted was to grow, the market alone would determine the pace of its development and not the motivations of the BAA to maximise the size of its asset base. These promises were generally welcomed by regional interests. Conservative Members from northern constituencies expressed their delight. Others were more cautious. They argued that promises were fine, but felt that action would be the test of the Government's sincerity. How wise they were.

The Government now seek to argue that subsidy to Stansted will, in the Secretary of State's own words, be "cut out", by ensuring that any transfer of funds between the holding company and its subsidiaries will take place only at the commercial rates of interest. This view is misconceived. Interest rates differ according to the risks involved. When capital is raised on the market by the holding company specifically for Stansted, the risks will not be attributable to Stansted, but will reflect the profitability of Heathrow. Therefore, the rate of interest will be lower than what it would otherwise be, and this will represent a hidden subsidy to Stansted — incapable of accurate definition. At the same time, there will be nothing to prevent the Stansted subsidiary not repaying the loan.

I fully understand that the Secretary of State will argue that the policing powers of the CAA will then come into play to combat predatory pricing behaviour. The central question here, however, is about the effectiveness of those powers and, more particularly, the extent to which it will be possible for all funding arrangements within the BAA group to be identified.

The North of England Regional Consortium asked independent accountants to examine part IV and to advise on whether the provisions were sufficient to achieve the objectives both of full transparency and resistance to predatory behaviour. I have to advise the Secretary of State that the Bill failed the test. His amendment, to be debated later, to clause 38 will improve the Bill, but it will still be riddled with deficiencies. The Government have shown no desire to correct them and tried to get by in Committee with assurances to the effect that we should not worry because the point is covered somewhere else or that everything will be all right on the night. That will no longer do. We are now at the Report stage and such empty assurances just will not wash.

Let me make it clear that full transparency will not be achieved unless the following minimum changes are made to the Bill. The first is that there must be a specific and mandatory requirement for the holding company to produce detailed accounts for each of its subsidiary companies. The BAA can discharge its Companies Act obligations simply by producing group accounts. As the Bill is presently drafted, the CAA will have only a discretionary duty to seek detailed accounts. Unless separate accounts are produced, it will not be possible to identify contracts and accounting practices within the group, or to prevent a misuse of assets and resources. Subsidy to Stansted, as the Secretary of State knows only too well, will take place in forms other than inter-company loans.

The second minimum change required is the need to give the CAA a full picture of income and expenditure under all headings, yet clause 37(2) provides for only the production of "aggregate" information. There are many types of ancillary services subsidised at Stansted which would be concealed by such information. Examples are air traffic control, where Stansted records a loss of over £1 million, and central charges, where there are many staff based centrally serving all three London airports. Unless full details are available, it is simply not possible to ascertain a true picture.

The third and final minimum change required affects the power given to the CAA to insist upon minimum charges at the London airports. This does not go far enough. The CAA should be concerned to ensure not only that charges are reasonable, but that they are cost based. This, of course, has particular relevance to Stansted.

Our major concern with part IV, however, and indeed with the total arrangements for restructuring the London airports, is that subsidy will be perpetuated as clearly as night follows day. It will be for the CAA to try to ensure that it is kept to reasonable levels. This will be no easy task. Indeed, much of the damage will have been done before the CAA can act. The development of Stansted, which has now been approved for investment purposes, will be under way shortly and will be massively subsidised, despite the fact that the Government in their White Paper promised that charges would rise steeply in order to meet the cost of increasing capacity. In the peak period, the cost-based charge for a Boeing 747 should be £5,533. It is presently £1,422. That is a difference of £4,111, and a huge 75 per cent. reduction.

Mr. Adley: To confirm what the right hon. Gentleman says, is he aware that a major tour operator has told me that, if the charges remain as they are, once the motorway system is completed it will be able to tell the average family going to Majorca, presently flying from Manchester airport, that it can save them at least £15 per head on their package tour by putting them in a bus and taking them to Stansted? That will be at least £60 for a family of four. That is the sort of thing that will happen unless the right hon. Gentleman's points are met.

Mr. Morris: I much appreciate the hon. Gentleman's intervention. He will appreciate that I am trying to put the case in hard summary, since many other right hon. and hon. Members wish to speak.

Our concern in the House must increase when account is taken of the North of England Regional Consortium's most recent publication "Stansted and the Airports Bill", which I warmly commend to the House. It is a document which shows that there is no inherent reason why Stansted cannot operate on a free-standing basis. Indeed, there seems to be considerable scope for that airport to meet its own development costs. That must be so if traffic demand for Stansted grows at a pace which the Government believe to be reasonable.

The Government cannot have it both ways. They cannot argue that market forces will ensure that demand for Stansted will be so high as to make a development necessary, and at the same time argue that subsidy is required to ensure that demand is accommodated at the airport. The North of England Regional Consortium believes that a rate of return of at least 5 per cent. could be generated by a £200 million investment in the airport. Some will argue that that figure is too low, but I would ask the Government to show me what assumptions have been employed that can demonstrate that the approved strategy is economic. I admit that there may well have to be savings if Stansted is to be free standing. Sir Norman Payne's objective of building the most substantial and lavishly equipped airport possible may have to be modified in the face of the commercial disciplines of the market place.

The amendments are crucial to a balanced national airports policy. That is the core of our concern. The aviation system is already over-regulated. Market forces are already distorted. Subsidy would only intensify those anomalies to the detriment of regions outside the south-east, and it is all the more unacceptable when it is not economically or socially justified.

I hope that the Secretary of State will now find himself able to accept the amendment. We could then agree across the Floor of the House a detailed definition of a free-standing airport. As I see it, such a definition would at the very least limit investment funds for Stansted to those coming from retained earnings or borrowings direct from the capital market. Loans from the holding company for the Stansted subsidiary would not be allowed. Does the right hon. Gentleman accept that definition?

In January of last year right hon. and hon. Members from all parts of the House rejected the Eyre report and its proposals massively to expand and subsidise Stansted. We did so for a variety of reasons, not the least being the way in which such a proposal would prejudice the north of England, and indeed all the airports outside the south-east. The vote on the amendments under discussion is just as important. I urge hon. Members on both sides of the House to join forces in the Lobby in support of the amendments.

Mr. Fred Silvester (Manchester, Withington): I support the amendment moved by the right hon. Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe (Mr. Morris), with which is grouped amendment No. 3. Amendment No. 1 would take Stansted out of the BAA's clutches; amendment No. 3 would remove Gatwick as well.

I am not perhaps the driest member of the Conservative party, in traditional terms, and it is perhaps curious that I should be making an appeal to a Secretary of State whose political reputation has been built on private enterprise and competition. My right hon. Friend was the scourge of monopoly in film distribution and, more recently, the lion of the buses. We need to know why, in the face of Norman Payne, he has become a lamb.

The situation is very odd. It is odder still because, according to the authority of my hon. Friend the Member for Worcestershire, South (Mr. Spicer), the original belief was that the best approach was to privatise the airports separately. In Committee, my hon. Friend said:

"my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and I have an initial prejudice towards the separate privatisation of the British airport companies". — [Official Report, Standing Committee J, 20 February 1986, c. 200.]

That is odd, too. The Secretary of State, who is by temperament in favour of separate companies, and the Minister originally believed that that was the best way to proceed.

A third curiosity to be added to the list is the undertaking given by the Minister many times that there will be no subsidies or special concessions given to Stansted which are bolstered by the operations at Heathrow and elsewhere. In Committee, my hon. Friend said:

"It is totally accepted by the Government that none of the three London airports should be able to develop or trade unfairly against other United Kingdom airports." — [Official Report, Standing Committee J, 20 February 1986: c. 204.]

What is odd is that the most direct and simple way of achieving that would be to stick with the original proposition to treat Stansted as a separate airport. We would not then have to jump through so many hoops; it would have happened automatically.

Faced with those oddities, I looked carefully at my hon. Friend's speech to find an explanation. He gave various reasons why it was essential that the three airports should be privatised together. First, he said that there was no competition between the three airports in price, access or service. That is also an oddity. We, who believe in the drive towards free enterprise companies, are suggesting that, even within the constraints of civil aviation, there will be no difference between the management of differently owned companies, that somehow one company will not press for better access and that another will not offer different services.

Even that is not the key point. My hon. Friend was referring to competition between the three London airports. He forgets that there is wider competition—with Luton, Southend, Bristol, Manchester and other regional airports. My hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch (Mr. Adley) gave an example of how that would operate. It is not simply a carving up of those three airports; it would have a ricochet effect throughout Britain's airports.

Mr. Michael Spicer: Is not the greatest competition with Schiphol?

Mr. Silvester: That was my hon. Friend's second point in Committee. I am dealing with his points in order. He said that we must ensure that the 11 per cent. of passengers who interlink at Heathrow to continue their journey to other countries do not buzz off to Schiphol or Frankfurt. I do not want to go over the whole matter again. My hon. Friend has had many opportunities to explain what he means, but he has singularly failed to do so. The competition is between Heathrow and Schiphol, Heathrow and Frankfurt or Heathrow and somewhere else. It is not between Stansted and Schiphol or Gatwick and Schiphol. He has not explained why providing additional capacity at Stansted will save for the United Kingdom the traffic that is changing planes at Heathrow, which is the only place where passengers want to change planes.

My hon. Friend's third argument—he underlined it with some crossness—was that we should find ourselves in trouble with the small airlines and regional airports that would be gradually excluded because Heathrow was becoming too full and they would be the first to be booted out. Even if that were true, my hon. Friend is driving a coach and horses through the Bill. He is setting up a huge regulatory apparatus. He knows as well as I do that one of the primary considerations that the CAA would have to bear in mind is the proper servicing of the London system from the regional airports. The CAA is governed by regulations.

In Committee my hon. Friend said that regulations would have to be extended and would be more difficult. He did not elaborate on that. No evidence has been produced to show that that would be necessary. The regulations exist. I have been unable to determine why the smaller airports and the small airlines should be excluded under one system any more than under another.

We come at the end to the truth. The Minister makes no bones about it. It is all set out for us to read. He said:

"If the London airports were to be privatised separately, the development of Stansted might be delayed until a time beyond which the capacity was required . . . My hon. Friend—that is, my hon. Friend the Member for Saffron Walden (Mr. Haselhurst)—

"accepted that a separate developer at Stansted might wish to pace his development leaving aside the question of how long it would take to sell the airport to a separate developer and from then on proceed with development. It is our view that development of Stansted must begin almost immediately."—[Official Report, Standing Committee J, 20 February 1986; c. 203-4.]

9.15 pm

That is the core of the argument. The core of the objection is fear of delay—delay in selling off the airport, delay between the sale of Stansted and the beginning of development, and delay because, in my hon. Friend's curious phrase, a separate developer might want to pace himself.

Mr. Haselhurst: Is my hon. Friend aware that, so eager is the British Airports Authority that there should be no delay, it has already issued official invitations to a ceremony next Tuesday to mark the start of the work?

Mr. Silvester: The BAA has never been known for its modesty. Its assumption that it will get its way here is part of history, is it not?

Let us consider the objections. As regards delay in selling off the airport, some Members—there were some in Committee—question the viability of Stansted as a saleable asset in its own right. I doubt whether that argument can be sustained for long. The right hon. Member for Wythenshawe has already drawn attention to the analysis by Peat Marwick, which shows quite clearly that it is a viable proposition. The question of what price is paid for any proposition is for the market to determine. Members on the Government Benches believe that, given an opportunity, the private enterprise system will provide the means for such an organisation to develop and to flourish, provided that there are no public restraints upon it.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has removed the main public restraints. He has got the planning permission that has dogged private enterprise. British Rail can hardly wait to start work on its railway line. The Government, as I understand it, have either approved or are prepared to approve the necessary infrastructure. The forward estimates for the market have been well underlined by the Secretary of State, aiming at £8 million. It is not a tenable argument to suggest that, given all that, Stansted is not a commercial proposition for a potential purchaser, particularly as it is in the south-east. Many companies, such as Manchester airport, have been making profits for many years. Stansted could easily do so, too. Nor do I think that the amount of money that we would get for Heathrow be much affected. I cannot believe that hiving off Stansted will stop someone buying Heathrow, with or without Gatwick.

Mr. Wilkinson: Is not a further significant argument the fact that the subsidising of Stansted by a privatised BAA could inhibit further development at Heathrow and the exploitation of that airport's full potential? We should bear that in mind.

Mr. Silvester: It is true that, in so far as the accounts become transparent, any subsidy to Stansted would be a charge against the profits of Heathrow, and that would have to be borne in mind by the shareholders.

The second point that my hon. Friend made was the delay between the sale of Stansted and the beginning of development. A lot of work has already been done, as my hon. Friend the Member for Saffron Walden well knows. There is no lack of enthusiasm or assistance in the Department of Transport to help this along. I have no doubt that if we were prepared to speed the thing along, we could get it moved in a way that everyone would find satisfactory. In passing, the disaster of British Airways may provide a window for the earlier launch of the British Airports Authority.

The last point that my hon. Friend made was that a separate developer might want to pace himself. That is where we should focus our attention. That is the nub; that is what it is all about. Pacing himself means responding to the market and not providing over-capacity, but fully utilising the assets. It means considering the various alternatives. In this case, the capital market exercises a discipline. I give my right hon. Friend full credit for having sought to provide non-subsidisation within the limits that he has set himself. He has done that in good faith, but from an impossible starting point. I have met nobody who can show me how, given a group company structure, it is possible to prevent Norman Payne and his boys from controlling Stansted in the manner which they wish.

The difficulties of finding a commercial rate of interest on capital have been outlined. The ease of raising capital will be substantially affected. On this basis of expenditure, Stansted will lose money for many years and will be a loss-making airport attracting business from other airports. The only way that my right hon. Friend will be able to meet his obligation is by imposing an extraordinary level of regulation. The Bill is full of regulations to which we are adding tonight.

If we approach the matter more directly and simply say that all the airports should be dealt with separately, we will meet the problem immediately and in full. It mystifies me why my right hon. Friend has not done that. He may be worried that, when we get down to the nitty gritty, Stansted will not be big enough soon enough, but he is putting before us a dubious proposition which at best will mean a short-term gain. In return we will have a long-term problem in dealing with a growing and powerful monopoly which will sit upon British civil aviation for many generations.

Mr. Lewis Carter-Jones (Eccles): I am delighted that the Secretary of State has returned to the Chamber. I cannot understand why he does not save the time of the House by accepting amendment No. 1. I shall read it out so that the House may agree that it accords totally with the political philosophy of the Secretary of State:

"Provided that such proposals shall make provision for Stansted Airport to be operated as an independent free-standing company."

That is what the Secretary of State has been advocating year after year. Why does he not save time by interrupting me now to say, "Of course we accept it," so that we can get on to other issues of greater import?

The fact is that Payne's panzers have got at him. Payne has made a pre-emptive strike. The hon. Member for Saffron Walden (Mr. Haselhurst) said that, despite the fact that we have not yet completed consideration of the legislation, all the plans are laid and everything is ready. It is a classic pre-emptive strike in the true panzer sense. We are allegedly discussing a development which, in effect, is already taking place. The Secretary of State should in honesty accept the amendment or tell us clearly that he is Payne's man. What we have is the voice of the Secretary of State but the hand of the chairman of the British Airports Authority.

I would not have accepted a clause of this type if it had applied to Manchester airport. If support is to be given, it should be given to those parts of the country which are in the greatest need. In Manchester we have a superb airport, capable of reinvigorating a depressed region. If the Secretary of State has changed his mind and is prepared to accept subsidies, why is he prepared to allow Stansted to be subsidised but not Manchester, where the greatest need lies?

Mr. Haselhurst: I am well aware that the House has been tolerant with me on a number of occasions when I have spoken about airports and Stansted. I think I am able to say that this is positively the last occasion on which, in a major debate, I shall be heard pontificating on this subject.

This debate is not a rehash of the question of the third London airport. When all other arguments failed, the BAA believed, and I think persuaded my hon. Friend to some extent, that this was really an attempt to undo the decision on Stansted. I say again that that is certainly not the intention behind these amendments.

It could be said that Stansted, as a free-standing airport, might be rather more of a success, to the chagrin of at least some of my constituents. I am looking at this matter on the basis of what is right for civil aviation. I also support the amendments on the basis of the political philosophy that, on the whole, more competition is better than less competition.

The case for separate ownership and the maximisation of competition ought to be self-evident, at least to my right hon. and hon. Friends. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has confessed his attraction to it on a number of occasions. Indeed, one feels that my right hon. Friend is philosophically drenched in the doctrine of more competition and more adherence to market forces. Yet somehow he has allowed himself to be overborne and all his instincts to be suppressed by the argument, one suspects, of the British Airports Authority that it should maintain a monopoly in the London airports system.

The arguments that have apparently persuaded my right hon. Friend have been referred to already by my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Withington (Mr. Silvester). There is the argument that the three airports cannot really compete. That is a contestable proposition. It is true that there is not scope for competition over 100 per cent. of the activities, but there is still some scope for competition between the airports.

However, the real point, and the one that I do not believe my right hon. Friend has properly addressed, is that there would be a quite different approach to the running of the airports by an operator who had all three of them as compared with operators who had one each. The whole attitude would be bound to be different. The owner of all three would not be under any great pressure to maximise the improvement of services at Heathrow and Gatwick when he had plenty of spare capacity at his disposal at a third airport in the system.

Anyone can run airports in that situation; it is the easiest thing in the world. Any half dozen of us could take charge of an airports authority which was in that happy situation because it would be almost impossible to fail to make money. But if there is competition, one airport against another, it becomes a harder and tighter game. That is what it should be, and that is what Conservatives, on the whole, tend to believe is the right way of running almost any organisation. We are prepared to introduce competition into the supply of water, gas and so on, where it might be argued that there is quite limited scope for competition, because we believe that it is right to do so. Therefore, why we cannot do it with airports simply baffles me.

There is the international competition argument, that London needs to be a system in order to compete with Amsterdam. My hon. Friend the Member for Withington has referred to that. It is most misleading to argue that, in order to expand facilities in London, Stansted, in particular, is necessary so that London can retain its competitive position. London can be competitive only through the maximisation of facilities at Heathrow. That is the test. If an international business man travelling to Europe has to interline and can do so on the one route at Amsterdam, he will do that. He will look twice at anything that is not as good as that. Therefore, we must maximise the facilities at Heathrow. The idea that people should come on a bus from Stansted round the M25 in order to satisfy London's competitive position is both laughable and ludicrous. It is astonishing that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State should use that as a serious argument.

9.30 pm

I now come to the hearts and flowers bit. It is said that if we do not go along with this monopoly, the small airlines—those dearest to our hearts—will be squeezed out. But I do not see why the operator at Heathrow should want to squeeze out small airlines which are a valuable source of his interlining business. Moreover, the charges for large and small aircraft can be, and are being, regulated in order to close the gap between them. But even if the operator at Heathrow wanted to behave like that, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State would have the power to ensure that no such unfair or discriminatory policy was allowed.

The back-up to that argument is that it would be extremely complicated for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to use the powers in the Bill and that it would be difficult to write the prospectus. But there is no point in having powers if they are so complex that they cannot be used. Furthermore, in taking those powers, my right hon. Friend must have some idea of how he might use them.

In, I believe, its policy document CAP 517, the CAA has put forward a proposal for distributing the traffic round London's airports. It is not necessarily the last word on the subject, but it represents a sensible and coherent approach. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State might favour another approach, but the CAA has shown that it is possible to produce a document explaining how the traffic could be distributed. Therefore, it is not impossible to get over the legal obstacles. The Secretary of State cannot say that he wants the powers but would not know how to use them.

There is then the argument over the delay in development. Whether someone believes that there is a risk of delay in development depends on whether he believes in the forecasts. The present forecast is that the London airports system will be saturated by 1991 unless extra capacity is provided, but if that is proved right it will be the first forecast to come true. I understand that Stansted is losing business on a year-on-year basis. For the sake of British avaiation, I hope that there will be a steady improvement in our position. However, it is unlikely that the forecast for 1991 will prove any more accurate than its predecessors.

Mr. Adley: Is not my hon. Friend perhaps a little too polite? He really means what many of us feel, which is that, regardless of transport and regional policy interests, the Government are trying to boost the notional value of Stansted as part of the privatisation of the BAA in order to achieve a quick return on capital regardless of the long-term effects on the country.

Mr. Haselhurst: My hon. Friend may be right about the intention, but it would be an extraordinary intention. It presupposes that people are incapable of reading a prospectus and do not understand what is happening about airports. They must know perfectly well the demand for the airports; and they must know the present profitable sectors in the London airport system. Stansted cannot be hidden if it is a loss maker. Its potential is the same under any ownership; it has a certain potential or no potential. It cannot be hidden in a basket of airports and flogged off to an unsuspecting customer.

Mr. Wilkinson: Does my hon. Friend agree that, if the privatised BAA operated entirely commercially, perhaps the most sensible thing it could do would be to sell Stansted as soon as it got it?

Mr. Haselhurst: That is possible but unlikely. The record of BAA shows that it has believed in building up its empire. I cannot believe that on the morrow of privatisation it will change its habits quite that quickly; in time it may do so, but not immediately. As my hon. Friend the Member of Withington pointed out, would anybody buy Stansted if it were offered separately? It is a commercial risk, but it is hardly for my right hon. Friend, on behalf of the Government, to try to argue that point, because he and the Government have convinced themselves that demand will be such that Stansted is vital to the capacity of the London system. If they believe that and know there will be this demand, and if we accept the forecast that Stansted will operate for 7 million to 8 million passengers per annum by 1995, it does not lie with them to argue that no one will buy an airport with that potential.

Mr. Dicks: Is it not shameful for the Government to support the BAA investment plans for Stansted by an input of many millions of pounds, when we have yet to get the Bill through the House?

Mr. Haselhurst: The BAA is ever hasty. It surprises me that the ceremonies should be going ahead so quickly. If the Government are right about the traffic forecast, Heathrow's ultimate capacity is 38 million to 40 million passengers per annum, and Gatwick may take as many as 25 million. However, thereafter any excess that wishes to go to London will have to go to the only other airport where capacity has been provided. It is the decision of the Government, endorsed by the House, that that capacity will be provided at Stansted. On that basis, people in private industry will be interested in taking the opportunity to exploit that potential and to make Stansted a successful airport.

The recurring point throughout our debates on this subject has been the question of cost subsidy, which was dealt with in some detail by the right hon. Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe (Mr. Morris). My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary has said that the Government are determined that there shall not be unfair trading between airports. Great efforts have been made—I am thankful for this—to put tighter clauses in the Bill to ensure full transparency. Transparency is one thing; effective prohibition of the practices is quite another. It may be perfectly all right to see something going on; the question is whether anything can be done about it in time. There will be a possibly destructive competitive effect on other airports in the meantime.

There is one sure way of dealing with the question of unfair trading without any ifs or buts and that is simply to have separate ownership of the airports in question; then unfair trading cannot happen. My right hon. Friend should trust his instincts and recognise that there is more than one way of effectively running an airport. We should not cut ourselves off from the possibility of an alternative method of management in the London system. This is an opportunity to create a regime which maximises competition instead of snuffing it out. We should not forgo it.

Mr. Litherland: To make blood curdle in the north-west of England one has only to mention subsidy to Stansted. There is a deep anxiety, especially in the north of England that, if Stansted is developed, it will be at the expense of regional airports. Many colleagues could speak on behalf of their regional airports, but I am most concerned with Manchester international airport, which is now known as Manchester airport since becoming a public limited company on 1 April.

There is a deep and widespread anxiety about the proposals to construct new rail links to Stansted, highway schemes costing about £30 million and infrastructure such as housing surrounding such a development as the extension of Stansted. With the Channel tunnel in the offing, a bright future is forecast for the south of England, but at whose expense?

Emotions are aroused on this subject. Investment in the south-east is viewed with scepticism as it is seen to prejudice jobs and prosperity in the regions. I refer to regions where closures in manufacturing have been relentless. Nearly 750,000 jobs have been lost in the north since 1977. The experience has been heartbreaking and demoralising. People in the regions want hope and a future.

I realise that we do not extend airports just to provide jobs. There must be a demand for the airport and its services. There is such demand at Manchester, so the airport acts as a catalyst in the region. Any diminution of the airport's role would be disastrous for the area. We have had today a lobby by trade unionists and workers from various airports. They told us in no uncertain terms of their prospects if there is any subsidy to Stansted. They fear for their jobs and their families. It is not that I or any of my colleagues oppose cross-subsidy. We made that clear in Committee. We oppose unfair and hidden subsidy that would create demand that is not true market demand. That is what will happen at Stansted.

It is feared that many regional airports are at a critical stage of redevelopment and that any massive subsidy to Stansted would create an imbalance. The Government have not reassured us that Stansted will not receive excessive subsidy. Emotions are aroused in the north because the issue is seen as another example of the great divide between the haves and the have-nots in the north and the south. The divide is getting wider. There is more deprivation in the area that I represent.

The North of England Regional Consortium can find no justification for supporting the continuation of any subsidy and argues most strongly that Stansted could stand on its own feet. We have heard from across the political spectrum that Stansted could and should stand alone. The consortium has led a campaign suggesting that Stansted should operate as a free-standing airport.

In that respect, there is great support from the Joint Airports Committee of Local Authorities and the Air Transport Users Committee. The need for Stansted to operate in that way relates to one objective — that of securing equal competition. We believe that, with subsidy to Stansted, there will be no equal competition. The throughput at Stansted, is about 500,000 passengers — well below the capacity of the existing terminal of 2 million passengers. Yet the terminal is to be expanded, initially to 7 to 8 million passengers, rising to 15 million passengers, at an initial capital cost of £200 million.

9.45 pm

Funding of that magnitude is incapable of being secured from surplus profits generated at Stansted. Therefore, we must conclude that the BAA approach is that cross-subsidy from profits generated at Heathrow airport must continue to support the operation of Stansted airport and to fund the development of Stansted's facilities.

The consortium accepts that there is a general case for subsidy in the transport sector. This acceptance is conditioned by two factors. The first is that it forms part of a coherent policy and the second is that it does not cause detrimental effects to the remainder of the system. The problem with subsidies to Stansted is that neither of those conditions is met.

Mr. Couchman: I shall detain the House only briefly. To judge from what my hon. Friend the Member for Saffron Walden (Mr. Haselhurst) said, it is clear that this is his last stand on the issue for some time. This is, indeed, the last battle by those who are against — [HON. MEMBERS: "No."]—the development of Stansted. They have realised that fact, and they have tabled the three amendments that we are discussing.

It is equally obvious from what the hon. Member for Manchester, Central (Mr. Litherland) said, that he believes this to be a battle between north and south over where investment should be directed. He talked of cross-subsidy and unfair trading, yet he will not acknowledge that the retained income from Heathrow should be used to invest in new facilities at Stansted.

It is obvious that the British Airports Authority, as it is constituted, and the future plc, would wish to be retained as an unfragmented whole, to be able to attract money from the market, to be able to retain greater income from the successful airports in the London hub to invest in Stansted, and to be able to create facilities which it believes to be necessary. I am persuaded of its arguments and from the beginning I have supported the development of Stansted.

My hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Withington (Mr. Silvester) spoke of this being a case of Heathrow versus Schiphol, but if London is to maintain its pre-eminent position, it is more a case of the London hub versus Schiphol.

Mr. Silvester: I would genuinely like some information from my hon. Friend. No one has ever explained to me how expanding the capacity at Stansted will enable people wishing to interline at Heathrow to continue to do that rather than go to Schiphol. How will that happen?

Mr. Couchman: There will be some redistribution of traffic from Heathrow to Stansted. No one has suggested that that would not happen. That will create additional capacity at Heathrow, which will be necessary for the increasing interlining trade. I support Stansted and will vote against the amendments if they are put to the test.

As I have said, I do not wish to detain the House for very long. I understand that many hon. Members wish to contribute to the debate. I merely add that it is curious that the right hon. Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe (Mr. Morris), who asked for your judgment, Mr. Speaker, on whether the Bill was hybrid, should associate himself with amendments which make clear the degree of hybridity which those who are opposed to Stansted would wish to build into the Bill.

Mr. Robert N. Wareing (Liverpool, West Derby): The hon. Member for Gillingham (Mr. Couchman) could not be further from the truth when he argues that the amendment is an attempt to prevent any progress being made with the development of Stansted airport. The hon. Member for Saffron Walden (Mr. Haselhurst) demonstrated that that is not the purpose of the amendment.

Some of us wonder whether the Secretary of State listens to the arguments of his hon. Friends, let alone of Opposition Members. The right hon. Gentleman is usually regarded as the high priest of free market economics, but he will not allow free market competition to stand in the way of the privatisation, as rapidly as possible, of all the London airports. That is the real reason for the Secretary of State having wandered away from his own theories. He has extolled the virtues of the free market economy so often in the House, yet he has succumbed to the pressures of the chairman of the BAA. It is unfortunate that he never succumbs to the democratic pressures of hon. Members in this place. He has decided to give way and to allow, albeit by artificial processes, the unfair subsidisation of the third London airport.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Central (Mr. Litherland) has said, we are not against subsidy. Indeed, we often argue the need for subsidy as a vehicle for planning — in this case the planning of airport development. I am, however, against unfair subsidy. That is what is creating the divide between north and south in this instance.

We are often told that we cannot allow undue development of airports at the expense of the London airports and that Londoners must not be expected to go to Manchester or to regional airports to start their journeys, but that is the usual process for so many who reside in northern Britain. London airports are being subsidised, yet Liverpool faces the prospect of administration by a joint board over the next three years, and rate capping. Incidentally, we do not regard Liverpool airport as being in competition with Manchester airport. We consider the airports to be complementary and believe that their development must proceed hand in glove.

If a public limited company is created, it will be subjected to all the costs that such companies face, including corporation tax, VAT and stamp duties. I advanced this argument in Committee, but never received a proper answer from the Minister. It seems that the assistance given to Liverpool airport will be on nothing like the scale that is now being offered to Stansted and the other London airports.

There have been developments at Liverpool airport in recent times as a result of co-operation between the then Merseyside county council and central Government. The demise of the county council will be a sad loss to many in that part of the country. As I have said, we face the prospect of a joint board structure. Investment in Liverpool airport has resulted in a new runway, airport terminal, apron and air control tower. Those developments have been funded by taxpayers' money. We are bound to ask ourselves whether taxpayers' money is being wasted. Liverpool, along with Manchester and other regional airports, will now be asked to compete at an unfair disadvantage with the London airports. That is totally wrong, and it is seen to be totally wrong by Conservative as well as by Labour Members.

I believe that airports such as Liverpool are facing a major disaster because the legislation will deprive them of any democratic structure and will pass them into the private sector at a time when they will be most disadvantaged. The Bill should be allowed to pass only if the amendment moved by my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe (Mr. Morris) is accepted.

In the north-west of England there is a strong feeling that the Government are biased towards the south. That feeling cuts right across party barriers.

In the area that I represent, 150,000 people are unemployed, of whom 54,000 are young people. We are seeing businesses disappear, but we are told by the Government that free enterprise zones and free ports are the way to the future. However, just, round the corner from the enterprise zone at Speke—not that I am a great supporter of enterprise zones—is Liverpool airport, now to be disadvantaged by the Bill.

I hope that Conservative Members will take into account not only this measure, but the burdens which are now being thrown on regional airports, such as Manchester and Liverpool, by other legislation, and that unfair competition is not what they were elected to pursue. I hope that they will join us in the Lobby on this group of amendments.

Mr. Adley: My hon. Friend the Member for Gillingham (Mr. Couchman) was not a Member some years ago. I think that it is now more than 13 years since, in the memory of some of my colleagues around me, the late Anthony Crosland, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport and others of us took our decision on Maplin for many reasons, including the regional policy reasons. If my hon. Friend the Member for Gillingham and the BAA think that this is the last they have heard of the Maplin story, to paraphrase another politician, they ain't heard nothin' yet.

I intervened in the speech of the right hon. Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe (Mr. Morris) to recount the brief story of a conversation with a tour operator operating package tours to Majorca and elsewhere using Manchester and other northern airports. The effect of the development of Stansted is deliberately to drag business to the south of England. The dragging of the business will be aided and abetted by the Government's policy over Stansted unless these amendments are accepted.

I have to say to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State that I regard this as little less than a piece of financial jiggery-pokery to maximise the value of the British Airports Authority in its immediate pre-privatisation period. I do not believe that the Government are honouring the spirit of the agreement that was reached with the House over the way to deal with Stansted. I regard the insult to the regions as something up with which I am not prepared to put as a Conservative Member. There is no doubt that what we are doing will disadvantage the northern regional airports. I regard it as shameful, and I shall certainly vote for the amendment.

Mr. Frank Cook: I am fairly confident that the words that I have to offer will not be taken well by the Secretary of State, nor even by the Under-Secretary, because they have been paying scant attention for the past 30 minutes. However, I hope that the hon. Member for Gillingham (Mr. Couchman) will pay close attention, because either he is incapable of understanding the points at issue, or he chooses deliberately to misrepresent them.

The point is not that Stansted might receive subsidy but that other airports throughout the provinces, which are already functioning effectively, have achieved that status and efficiency by dint of effort over previous years——

It being Ten o'clock, the debate stood adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Ordered,

That, at this day's sitting, the Airports Bill may be proceeded with, though opposed, until any hour. — [Mr. Archie Hamilton.]

Bill, as amended (in the Standing Committee), again considered.

Question again proposed, That the amendment be made.

Mr. Cook: The provincial airports have achieved their efficiency and effectiveness without any subsidy, and by dint of hard work and effort. That would not be so if Stansted could be cross-subsidised by other airports within the BAA. We are told, reliably, that the counter to any possible cross-subsidy would be the business of transparency. Presumably one would be able to identify the event if it took place.

I say to the Secretary of State, as he now appears to have perked up a little and may be paying closer attention, that in the days when Black Bess was the animated flying machine travelling between York and London it was small consolation to the passengers in the stage coach that the name of the robber was Dick Turpin.

Mr. Wilkinson: My hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Withington (Mr. Silvester) made a speech of the highest quality. He has a Rolls-Royce of a mind, and those who, like myself, have to make do with jalopies or bangers as mental equipment are full of admiration for the way in which he moved the amendment. It goes to the heart of the matter. I even wonder whether my hon. Friend was being too politically candid and intellectually honest for his own good.

The truth is, first, that the BAA is hell-bent on having Stansted and develop it rapidly regardless of the environmental consequences, and perhaps even regardless of the actual air transport need. As my hon. Friend the Member for Saffron Walden (Mr. Haselhurst) said, it is great at empire building. However, I doubt whether that is in the national interest. The fact is that, for scheduled traffic, the airports that people want to go to most in the London area are Gatwick and Heathrow. Our policy should maximise the fullest utilisation of those airports. If my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State were to accept the amendment and permit Stansted to be sold separately, the maximum profits from Gatwick and Heathrow could go towards the development of those two airports to the full, not only in their interests, but in the interests of the travelling public from the regions. There are people, such as those who come down from Liverpool, who need to go to Heathrow to interline with intercontinental flights.

Inclusive tour, charter traffic is the main traffic that is likely to be attracted to Stansted. It could be attracted to Stansted only by virtue of the ultra-low charges there, to which my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch (Mr. Adley) referred, to the detriment of the airports near the towns from which the holidaymakers wish to fly. It is beneficial to the holiday-making public that they should be able to go on holiday from a local airport. Any policy which derogates against that is detrimental to the convenience of passengers in their precious holiday time, but, more important, it is detrimental to good regional development in Britain.

I believe that the policy stinks. The north of Britain is woefully economically deprived. There is a huge economic gulf between the south-east and the north. Why should people be artificially attracted to airports such as Stansted, which they do not wish to use, when the north is crying out for the jobs and the infrastructural development that is associated with airports?

I hope that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will think again. Many airports, such as nearby Luton, run the risk of seeing the developments which they have initiated over the years being negated by the artificial development of Stansted. I am convinced that if Stansted were to operate independently, that would be in the national as well as the local interests, which were so eloquently set out by my hon. Friend the Member for Saffron Walden.

Mr. David Madel (Bedfordshire, South West): It is not just a matter of the inconvenience to the travelling public if Stansted were subsidised to a low level. Such subsidy jeopardises many thousands of jobs at Luton airport which are vital to Bedfordshire. In view of all the difficulties last month about another industry, I need hardly stress the importance of keeping jobs at Luton airport.

Mr. Wilkinson: I am sure that my hon. Friend is right.

Mr. Lambie: I am a Scottish Member of Parliament and a representative of the regional airports in Scotland. I believe that the future of the four Scottish airports—three Lowland airports and Aberdeen airport — will depend upon tying up with the London airports: Heathrow, Gatwick and Stansted.

There is no competition between the Scottish and London airports. If we are to maintain the United Kingdom as a centre of international air transport, the competition will be between London airports and the continental airports. I have enough confidence in the future growth of international air traffic to believe that there is enough traffic to sustain not only Heathrow and Gatwick but Stansted.

We can develop the northern airports by utilising the facilities that we have. Unfortunately, in Scotland we have three Lowland airports which serve a population of only 5 million. We cannot compete with London. Indeed, we cannot compete with Manchester airport, which serves an area with a population of 20 million. Glasgow and Prestwick airports cannot compete with Manchester, but they can be complementary to Manchester. We cannot compete for traffic with the London airports, but we can be complementary to them.

Due to the lead up to privatisation, British Airways is being forced to subsidise the development of independent airlines to and from the Scottish airports. Every day in the newspapers we see new airlines being designated to serve Glasgow and Edinburgh airports and to build up communications with the continental airports. The latest airline link is between Glasgow airport and Dusseldorf. A new company is being developed to link Edinburgh and Glasgow airports with continental airports. Therefore, there is a future for the Scottish airports. If one has confidence in the growth of international and national air transport, there is a piece of the cake for every airport in the United Kingdom.

In the United Kingdom both Labour and Conservative Governments have prevented people in some areas from developing their native talents in the hope that other areas would develop in their place. Even a Labour Government stopped development in the south of England in the hope that that development would shift to the north of England and to Scotland. That has never happened. It might happen in a period of economic growth, but in times of economic restraint companies which have moved to Scotland and to the north of England move back to the midlands and the south-east of England.

We must now support policies based on confidence in Britain's future and the growth of national and international airlines serving the United Kingdom. That is why, as a Scottish Member of Parliament, I do not object to the build-up of Stansted. The south-east of England needs Stansted, as it needs Heathrow and Gatwick. But I want the Government to change their economic policy and to go for growth not only in airlines and airports but in economic activity. If they do that, there will be a share of the cake for everyone.

I see the future of the Scottish airports being tied to the airports in the south of England. Let us go for growth. Let us develop the airports in the south-east of England. If that happens, Manchester and the Scottish airports will develop and we shall all be lucky. Let us not repeat the policies that have been carried out over the past 45 years of stopping developments in certain areas in the hope that they would move to other areas. That has not happened in the past and it will not happen in the future.

I am against the amendments. If they are accepted, they will be bad not only for the Scottish airports and their future, but for the future of the aerospace industry in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Bill Walker: I shall not take up in detail what the hon. Member for Cunninghame, South (Mr. Lambie) has been saying, but I too am a Scottish Member of Parliament and I was disappointed that we were unable to debate new clause 10 which related almost exclusively to Scotland and the Scottish airports. But amendment No. 3 deals with the airports operating in Scotland and says that they should not be regarded as serving the same area. Of course, anyone who knows the four airports in Scotland knows that they do not serve the same area and in that sense they do not compete with each other.

The nub of the issue is whether one accepts that, according to the Government, the London airport system consists of Stansted—the lowest in the order of priority—Gatwick, and then Heathrow, which is the jewel in the crown. It could be argued that, looking at a map, Luton is close enough to London also to be considered as a London airport, but it is not, conveniently, owned and operated by the BAA. Otherwise, the probability is that it too would belong to that so-called system.

Anyone who studies that so-called system will realise that the airports have evolved because airlines wish to go there. That is important. The airlines wish to go to those airports and there were inducements to the airlines to do certain things. It was suggested initially that Gatwick would be largely a charter operation and it was developed extensively by the charter operators. Subsequently, however, non-charter services have gone there. The scheduled services have gone there, and there is the beginning of a hub and spoke operation. It is believed that it is possible simply to decant airlines from Gatwick or Heathrow into Stansted and, as if by magic, produce a hub and spoke operation. Those who believe that do not realise how airports have developed and are likely to develop, or how much damage such management can do to the free market forces that the Government support.

I believe that Stansted will develop because charter airlines will want to go there. The question is whether they will have been persuaded to go there. In the absence of real direction, the usual persuasion is the offer of lower landing charges, and other facilities that are much cheaper than those offered by the obvious competitors.

The first airport to be at risk in that respect must be Luton. Other airports will be affected, too. Birmingham, for instance, services a similar catchment area. When one considers all that, one realises that the system is designed to enable the BAA to do what it wants with its empire. It has little to do with the needs and wishes of air transport itself. Left to its own devices, air transport would develop without anyone directing anyone else to go anywhere. The main airports are not yet saturated.

I therefore approve of amendment No. 3, to which I have put my name, and I am prepared to support it in the Division. I believe that anyone who tries to make comparisons among airports is comparing apples with oranges. We cannot run an airport transport system in that way.

I am pleased that my right hon. and hon. Friends on the Front Bench are attempting at last to give us a comprehensive and understandable aviation policy. In doing so they are bound to make some friends and, indeed, some enemies. It has become clear this evening that there are many who would favour allowing Stansted to operate independently rather than in some sort of transparent accounting framework. Anyone who knows anything about accounts knows that things that are supposed to be transparent often turn out on closer inspection to be rather opaque. It is possible to fudge.

I hope that those on the Front Bench have heard the message. There is deep concern in the House that we should not privatise the airports as a group simply because we think that we would get a better deal by doing so. I commend my right hon. Friend for grasping the nettle. I hope that the endeavour will no falter because we find ourselves doing what the BAA wants and not what we believe is best for competition, the airlines, the airports and customers.

Sir Ian Percival (Southport): This is a strange debate. In common with my right hon. and hon. Friends on the Front Bench, all my hon. Friends who have spoken really believe in the need for, and the desirability of, competition. We really believe that the enterprises that succeed should be those that provide services that people want at a price that they are willing to pay. We also believe in the other side of the coin. We deplore monopolies and unfair competition.

Damascus had nothing in comparison with tonight. We are happy to be joined in these beliefs by right hon. and hon. Members on the Opposition Benches. What we do not understand is why the Government do not share those views with us this time.

I do not want to make this a dispute between the north and the south. Manchester must compete with Stansted, Luton and everywhere else. We can and will compete. However, we are entitled to expect that we will not be disadvantaged in doing so. We are entitled to expect that in absolute and general terms. We are especially entitled to expect it because, as everyone knows, we do have some problems that other places do not have. We are doing our best to fight them, and we deserve to be supported rather than disadvantaged.

I do not think that the division between the north and the south is anything like as great as some people suggest. However, I warn my right hon. and hon. Friends that the provisions in the Bill are likely to make any division there is greater, and none of us wants that. That is another reason for accepting our proposal.

It is plain that unless Stansted is a free-standing operation we shall be disadvantaged. No one can disguise that. I give my right hon. Friend credit because he has recognised that danger and has gone some way to try to find a solution. That makes it even more difficult to understand why he will not come this one further step with us. He has recogised the danger that we will be disadvantaged and has tried to find a solution. It is clear that he has not succeeded, despite his efforts. What we are asking for would provide a solution.

If it is free-standing, the airport will grow at the rate required if it responds to market forces. If there is the need that there is said to be, and if somebody is efficient in meeting that need, there will be the necessary growth. If someone provides the services that are required—or so we are told—at a price which people are willing to pay, it will survive as a free-standing operation. If it cannot so survive, by our test it should not survive.

[Sir Ian Percival]

We are told that the need is so great that it must be met quickly or there will be trouble. If that is not true, what are we worrying about? If it is true, and if I were a buyer who believed that I could run an efficient operation, I would not have too much trouble in selling shares. So why is it feared that the so-called demand will not be satisfied quickly enough? It is because it is believed that it can be met quickly enough only if it is subsidised. It cannot be met on commercial lines, only on non-commercial lines.

I do not like to see my right hon. and hon. Friends supporting that proposition. They know that I am not a rebel; I am not one who goes into the Lobby for the fun of it or to get my name in the newspapers. However, I shall go into the Lobby tonight because I do not think that the fate of the Government hangs on this issue. I wish that they would come with us and say, "We are persuaded, too, like some others on the road to" — [AN HON. MEMBER: "Mandalay."] That is an insight into what is required. I wish that the Government would come with us on this issue.

I hope that my hon. Friends who support the amendment will press it to a Division. It is the only way to show the strength of our feeling. As I have said, I do not regard it as an issue likely to bring down the Government. Our object is to bring home to the Government that we respect their desire to meet the difficulty, we do not think that they have met it, and so we want them to come a stage further with us to meet it. We are prepared to back that view with our votes, even though there is a three-line Whip.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: Since the Secretary of State is making one of his rare appearances on this Bill I would ask him to justify the things that he has not so far taken the trouble to justify — should he be courteous enough to listen to me as he has not done to anyone else so far. How is it that, of his hon. Friends who have spoken tonight, only the one who is a Parliamentary Private Secretary has spoken in support of what he intends to do? We have not had answers to any of the questions raised in Committee or beforehand about the whole issue of cross-subsidisation. Will the Secretary of State give a simple answer to one question? Should he resist these amendments tonight, what requirement will he insert to guarantee that the accounts of Stansted airport are publicly available? The Secretary of State has come alive! What guarantee will he give that the accounts of Stansted airport will be publicly available, so that hon. Members can draw their own conclusions about the basis of the subsidisation that will take place?

Mr. Robert Hughes: There have been two main strands in this very interesting debate. The first has come mainly from Conservative Members who have argued that the Bill as it stands is inadequate because it fails to reflect their wish for a proper policy on private competition; the second strand has come primarily from the Labour Benches, expressing the belief that fairness and equality are necessary in the discussions and in the competition between the regional airports and the London airports, particularly Stansted.

I am totally in favour of a balanced airport development. I want to see encouragement of the growth of regional airports — Manchester, Birmingham, Newcastle, Prestwick or wherever. They should all have a fair chance to develop. They should certainly not be starved of funds: they should be in a position to provide adequate facilities, comparable with those provided by other airports.

Patently, Government policy is against fair competition. As the Bill stands, and if it passes through this House and the other place without amendment, regional airports will have to operate with one hand tied behind their backs: as long as the majority ownership is in the hands of local authorities, the airports will be subject to local government expenditure restraints. The Government will be able to control the pace of development at regional airports by keeping the purse strings tight.

The Government's answer to that is simple. They say that under the new structure the local authority airports can escape from controls by selling equity capital to a total of more than 50 per cent. At that point they will be free of restraint as regards raising money in the private market. This is one of the most reprehensible parts of the Bill, because it is nothing less than blackmail. It is compelling local authorities to undertake a course with which they do not want to proceed. It is quite disgraceful that the Government should operate in this way.

The regions have cause for concern. That is what is at the heart of this debate. Their concern is about what will happen to traffic and to development. I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Cunninghame, South (Mr. Lambie) that the growth in international traffic is likely to be of an order to satisfy everyone, that the regional airports, the London airports and Stansted can get a proper and fair share of the available traffic, and that, all things being equal, there is not necessarily a contradiction between development at Stansted and development at regional airports. But that will only be the case, if there is fair competition and if there are no restraints on the development of regional airports. In the short term, I fully understand why the regional airports should be concerned that Stansted will drain traffic away, that it will not only inhibit growth at Manchester and elsewhere, but will actually take away some of the existing traffic.

If we look at the recent Civil Aviation Authority report on access to Heathrow from regional airports, we have grounds for concern. It is reported, for example, that because of the heavy congestion at Heathrow the first of the services to be taken out of Heathrow will be the links between Dundee and Inverness. Next there is a threat to services from Guernsey, the Isle of Man, Plymouth, Newquay and Jersey. It is further proposed that if that does not deal with the congestion, there will be restrictions on flights to Heathrow from all the United Kingdom regional airports with the exception of Glasgow, Edinburgh and Belfast. If there is restriction of traffic into Heathrow, the extra traffic will have to go to Stansted. Therefore, there is a strong feeling among many hon. Members that Stansted will disturb the efforts of regional airports to maintain or improve services.

10.30 pm

The problem arises because the Government do not have an airport policy. They simply say, "Leave it to the free market and it will all sort itself out." The fact that there may be casualties on the way is just too bad. The curious thing is that while the Government are saying that, on the one hand, in other parts of the Bill a labyrinth of controls is being built up to inhibit competition. The Government are trying to have their cake and eat it. It is not surprising that many Members in all parts of the House are concerned for different reasons about the effects of Stansted and the way it will develop.

I cannot ask my hon. Friends to support amendment No. 3. As I understand it, it would mean that the three London airports would be sold off to totally independent companies. I am totally opposed to that. I want one company to be responsible for the seven main airports; whoever owns them, they must stay together. That is my view not just because of my Scottish connections but because of general future development.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe (Mr. Morris) has put forward a full and fair case on amendment No. 1. All my hon. Friends representing regional airports are asking for no more than fair treatment. They are entitled to such treatment. For that reason, I shall certainly ask them to support amendment No. 1 in the Lobby tonight.

Mr. Ridley: We have had a full and high quality, if not totally unfamiliar, debate on this issue, which has been before the House for nearly a year. Little new argument has been put forward, but old arguments have been repeated with renewed force and skill.

I take exception to one speech, that of my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch (Mr. Adley), who said that the tacit agreement that had been reached last June when the airports White Paper was published had not been kept. That I must repudiate. I believe that the contents of the Bill are almost identical in every material respect both to the statement that I made on 5 June and to the White Paper that was issued on that day, towards which hon. Gentlemen felt less unenthusiastic than they appear to feel tonight.

My hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Withington (Mr. Silvester) made an accomplished speech; so accomplished that he managed to accuse me of being a wet. If bringing massive help to Manchester airport is the tactic of a wet, I plead guilty. I have presided—if that is the right word — over a period when massive investment—far greater than under the Labour party—has taken place in all the regional airports. I have done everything that I could to promote the real source of growth for regional airports — the provision of more traffic by the opening up of more routes.

I persuaded British Airways to subsidise 14, I think it was, routes out of regional airports by new operators. I allowed many international routes into Manchester. I think that 14 extra routes are now operating from Manchester. It is that traffic that brings the prosperity, that brings the extra jobs. That is not what we are talking about today. The debate today is about how we should treat Stansted. If that is the sort of thing that a wet does, I plead guilty, with pleasure, to my hon. Friend.

Mr. Churchill (Davyhulme): It would be churlish of those of us who represent north-west constituencies not to pay a tribute to my right hon. Friend for the tremendous work that he has done on behalf of Manchester, from which today one can fly to twice as many scheduled destinations as one could this time a year ago. None the less, does my right hon. Friend deny that Stansted, over the years, has been built up by a system of cross-subsidies from Heathrow and Gatwick, at the expense of Manchester and other regional airports? And is it not the purpose of the Bill as it is drafted to allow this cross-subsidisation to continue?

Mr. Ridley: If my hon. Friend and the right hon. Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe (Mr. Morris) will allow me, I have a lot to say on this matter of the alleged cross-subsidy, on which they concentrated, but I would rather take my speech in my own order, and I must try to be as brief as possible.

The best speech was that by the hon. Member for Cunninghame, South (Mr. Lambie), who only asked one thing of the Government, and that was a high rate of economic growth. He will be delighted to know that we are now into our fifth consecutive year of growth, but that perhaps is outside the scope of this debate.

I am not proposing to keep the seven airports together in order to maximise profits so that we can get the most out of the sale. Nor am I doing it because I have given way, as has been alleged, to the BAA or its chairman. I am doing it because I am trusting my instincts, as my hon. Friend the Member for Saffron Walden (Mr. Haselhurst) asked me to do.

I shall make three points in passing. First, the amendments are technically defective, but I shall not rest on that. Secondly, the hon. Member for Liverpool, West Derby (Mr. Wareing) said that he saw Liverpool and Manchester as an airport system. They are in competition, close together as they are, but they are an airport system. Thirdly, and most astonishing of all, amendment No. 3 exempts the four Scottish airports from the requirement to be privatised separately. Three of them at least — Glasgow, Prestwick and Edinburgh — can be regarded only as a system. Thus, when it comes to Scotland and the north-west, airports are a system and cannot be made to compete, but when it comes to London, the biggest conurbation, the biggest system of the lot, everything is different.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: I am amazed at the Secretary of State's seeming ignorance of the airports system in Britain. Is he suggesting that the argument about cross-subsidisation applies between Manchester airport and Liverpool airport? If he is, he is even more ignorant than I thought he was.

Mr. Ridley: I hesitated before I gave way, and I made a mistake. I should not have given way, because I have made it clear that I am coming to the cross-subsidy argument. If hon. Gentlemen will be patient, I shall give way after I have dealt with that point.

Mr. Bill Walker: I hope that my right hon. Friend will not suggest that the three London airports which form a system into which all international flights can fly can be compared to Scotland. In Scotland, that is not the case. That cannot be done in Scotland. In fact, trans-Atlantic flights can fly only into Prestwick.

Mr. Ridley: The Scottish airports operate as a system, as indeed do the London airports, and that is why they should stay together.

Why is it that all airlines want to serve Heathrow? It is considerably more expensive than Stansted or Gatwick. It is much harder to get the slot that one wants at Heathrow. The standards, to be polite, are no higher than at Gatwick, and the roads and car parks are congested at Heathrow. Yet all airlines and passengers want to go to Heathrow rather than to any of the other London airports. The reason is that it accommodates the maximum number of interlining aircraft. Also, Heathrow is thought, not always truthfully, to be the quickest and easiest London airport to get to. It follows from that that one really cannot believe that there is any form of meaningful competition between Heathrow and, say, Gatwick or Stansted, in the sense that one could increase or decrease prices at Heathrow, or improve the services or cause them to deteriorate, and by that means affect the natural and enormously strong preference, or even prejudice, that exists for using Heathrow out of the three airports in that system.

As the hon. Member for Cunninghame, South said, the competition is not between Heathrow, Gatwick and Stansted. It is between the London system, the Paris system, the Amsterdam system, and so on. Of course, 20 per cent. of Heathrow traffic is interlining traffic. Why else do the Dutch mount a roadshow to try to show the advantages of Schiphol? Why does Frankfurt advertise in The Times its advantages at such expense if not to try to take the lucrative interlining traffic away from the London system?

The hon. Members for Dundee, West (Mr. Ross) and for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours), and people from many other parts of the country, are alarmed that the Civil Aviation Authority, in its first draft review of the traffic distribution policy, has suggested that certain domestic air flights should not go into Heathrow, but should go elsewhere. Whatever is decided about these matters—the interlining or the routes into Heathrow—it affects the profitability of Heathrow and the profitability of the other airports.

How can one write a prospectus for Heathrow, Gatwick and Stansted if we first decide the question of domestic flights and later decide what the traffic distribution policy will be? We will affect profitability. This constant change in emphasis in aviation policy must be accommodated within three airports. It is easy if it is a system, but if each airport's fortunes depend on each decision, and if the competition is upset by each decision, it becomes impossible both to write a prospectus for privatisation and to justify the changes which affect the profitability of each airport.

I must ask the House why there is so much concern. Over the past six years, when Stansted has veritably been heavily subsidised, Manchester's traffic has grown from 3·5 million passengers per annum to 6 million, whereas the number of Stansted's passengers has remained at 500,000. Despite the massive subsidy, it is Manchester that has grown and not Stansted. Therefore, it is difficult to complain particularly if I now give the House the assurance it has sought that there will be no subsidy from the other London airports to Stansted. The hon. Member for Manchester, Central (Mr. Litherland) talked about a massive subsidy, but this will not be the case.

I shall now consider what is in the Bill.

The accounts must, under clause 37, be transparent and apply to each separate airport company. They will be Companies Acts accounts, audited by auditors, and, in answer to the hon. Member for Stretford (Mr. Lloyd), they will be publicly available for all to see.

10.45 pm

There can be cross-investment only at commercial rates. Perhaps I might quote the chairman, Sir Norman Payne, who said:

"The 1986 charges are the first step in a series of steps which the BAA intends to take to raise Stansted's charges to a level which reflects the cost of the new development, in order that a proper return is achieved on the new investment."

That policy is already in effect.

There are other amendments which will not, as my hon. Friend the Member for Withington suggested, underpin the defences against transparency. They will give the CAA fuller powers still to prevent predatory pricing. The CAA will police matters to ensure that there is no subsidy to Stansted. There will be investment only in the initial loss-making period.

Mr. Geoffrey Dickens (Littleborough and Saddleworth): My tendency at the moment is to vote against the Government, because I have not been satisfied thus far. Gatwick, Stansted and Heathrow could raise money as a block because of their profitability. They would therefore have the advantage over Manchester for expansion. The regional airports are worried about the London airports' ability to raise cheap money because they are being sold as one big block.

Mr. Ridley: I should very much like to get the weight of my hon. Friend on my side in the Division Lobby, so I shall explain the matter to him. Manchester and other local authority airports have been able to raise money through local authorities at rates which have been close to the Government's borrowing rate, and considerably cheaper than the rate at which any private sector company would be able to raise money. The security of Manchester airport, when owned by the local authority, is the same as the security of the Government, so in terms of security and cheapness of borrowing Manchester airport will have the edge over the BAA.

It is time that I asked the House to reject these amendments. I have put up arguments which I hope will be found convincing in all quarters of the House.

Mr. Alfred Morris: With permission, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I should like to reply. The Secretary of State has manifestly disappointed his right hon. and hon. Friends, not to mention my right hon. and hon. Friends. He was virtually friendless in the debate, and wholly unconvincing in his reply. We have won the debate. Let us hope that we can win the vote.

Question put, That the amendment be made:

Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. Peter Lloyd and
Mr. Robert Boscawen.

Question accordingly negatived.

11 pm

Mr. Ridley: I beg to move amendment No. 4, in page 2, line 24, leave out 'and' and insert 'or'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): With this it will be convenient to take Government amendment No. 5.

Mr. Ridley: These are technical amendments, but I shall explain their effect if the House wishes me to do so.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment made: No. 5, in page 2, line 35, leave out 'and' and insert 'or'.—[Mr. Ridley.]

Clause 12

TRANSFER OF AIRPORT UNDERTAKINGS OF LOCAL AUTHORITIES TO COMPANIES OWNED BY SUCH AUTHORITIES

Mr. Ancram: I beg to move amendment No. 7, in page 10, line 25, leave out subsection (5) and insert—

'(5) References in subsection (1) to carrying on the business of operating an airport as a commercial undertaking include references to carrying on any activities which, at the time when the direction in question is given, are carried on at the airport or on airport land—

(a) by the principal council, or (as the case may be) any of the principal councils, who control the airport,

(b) by any subsidiary by whom the airport is owned as mentioned in section 11(3),

(c) by any person managing the airport under the terms of any lease or other arangement made by or on behalf of the principal council or councils who control it or by any such subsidiary, or

(d) by any person who has been granted a right to carry on activities there by any council, subsidiary or person falling within any of the preceding paragraphs, with the exception of any activities which the Secretary of State has, before the date referred to in subsection (2), agreed with the principal council or councils who control the airport should not be carried on by the company to be formed in pursuance of the direction.

(5A) In subsection (5) "airport land", in relation to an airport, means land which is attached to the airport and was on 1st April 1986 administered with the airport as a single unit.'.

Under clause 12(1) the Secretary of State may require a principal council controlling an airport to form a company for the purpose of operating the airport as a commercial undertaking and carrying on "any activities which appear to the council to be incidental to or connected with carrying on that business".

We are concerned that, left as it is, the present wording might allow a principal council—perhaps inadvertently—to take a too narrow view of what activities fall within either clause 12(1)(a) or 12(1)(b) and draw up, accordingly, a narrow memorandum for its public airport company. As a result, the company might be prevented from undertaking the full range of activities that the Government would expect it to undertake and would, indeed, prevent the transfer under clause 14 of the assets used in those activities. Hon. Members concerned will remember the assurances that were given by the Government in Committee that any facility which is part of the necessary equipment of the airport, such as the car park, terminal, duty-free shop or any matter to do with the operation of the airport, such as the fire station, baggage facilities or the freight cargo terminal, will be included in the scheme.

The proposed amendment, by requiring that the business of operating the airport as a commercial undertaking should include any activities carried on at the airport or on airport land, whether by the council, its subsidiary, or manager or a concessionaire, at the time when the direction to form an airport company is given, avoids a too narrow view being taken with the consequence either that the principal council is frustrated in that it cannot transfer relevant activities to the company, or the Government's intention is frustrated for the same reason. Conversely, should the council wish to bring within the ambit of the airport company any activities incidental to or connected with the airport business, but not at the time of the direction part of the airport business, it may do so under the provisions of clause 12(1)(b), subject, of course, to the Secretary of State's approval of the scheme under the provisions of clause 14.

The provision is necessarily widely drawn, and it is recognised that in some cases it might be better to exclude a particular activity which would fall within the provision. In such a case the activity may, by agreement between the Secretary of State and the controlling authority or authorities, be excluded.

I believe that that clarifies the situation that was referred to in Committee. I ask the House to support the amendment.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 13

AIRPORTS TO WHICH SECTION 12 APPLIES

Mr. Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): I beg to move amendment No. 9, in page 10, line 36, at end insert

'and if the local authority owner has not already made arrangements for the airport to be managed on a commercial basis by a suitably qualified and experienced operator who is not an employee of a local authority.'.

I am grateful for the opportunity of raising a minor amendment which is vital to the borough of Southend and to at least one other airport owned by a local authority in this country. I am particularly grateful for the support given by my hon. Friend the Member for Tiverton (Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop).

The Minister will be aware that I and my colleague in Southend, the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, have expressed concern over a small aspect of the Bill. However, I should like to make it abundantly clear that I fully support the objective of the Bill, which is to privatise the British Airports Authority and, more importantly, to bring commercial criteria into the management of services provided by local authorities.

The amendment is simply designed to exempt from the plc requirements those airports, I believe only two in number, which have already been transferred to full commercial and profitable management by the local authority owners. The Minister will be aware from his recent visit that Southend airport is managed commercially and profitably, to the advantage of Southend and its ratepayers, by British Airports International. We have a superb manager, Mr. Gareth Evans, who has transformed the finances of our airport. It is running successfully, profitably and well, and in the interests of the travelling public and the ratepayers of Southend.

The Minister will be fully aware that Southend borough council does not interfere in any way with the running of the airport. I am sure that that will be confirmed by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry who has been constantly in touch with the Department as, of course, have I and Southend borough council. I am sure that my right hon. Friend would also confirm that, far from being opposed to privatisation and commercial practices, the Southend borough council is, in some ways, the ideal borough for those who think that we should have commercial management of our activities. We led the privatisation of local authority services. We introduced the first major privatisation of the cleansing department. That saved the ratepayers about £500,000 in its first year. We have also privatised many of our services. Believe it or not, we have even privatised our successful and world-famous pier. There has been a major new investment in it, a new train has been established and we are delighted that Princess Anne is opening our new, modernised pier in a few weeks.

Southend has led the field in privatisation and I think that hon. Members will be delighted to hear that, while other councils have been shoving up their rates time and again, Southend borough council reduced its local rate burden this year and I think that it should be congratulated on that.

When we have an airport running commercially by commercial managers without interference from Southend borough council I appeal to the Minister and ask what possible advantage there can be to Southend, the airport, the ratepayers or the travelling public in forcing the council to establish a plc. It seems to be utterly pointless. On Second Reading the Minister told us not to worry because all the shares could be retained by the local authority. It will be a rather strange company with only one shareholder, but the Minister said "Do not worry, all the shares can be retained by Southend borough council."

As you are well aware, Mr. Deputy Speaker, setting up a plc is an expensive business. In Southend, we like to watch our pennies and we ask the Minister what possible advantage there can be to anyone in forcing Southend to establish a plc. I fully accept that in other areas where the local authorities run the airports and perhaps do not do it very successfully or do it at a considerable loss, there is a case for telling them that they have to change and that they have to privatise, put in a plc and change their ways. But why on earth should we in Southend be forced to do that when the airport is already run commercially and profitably?

It is only fair to say to the Minister that in Southend we are becoming a bit worried about the attitude of the Department of Transport to Southend borough council. We have asked it to do only three things recently, and we have got egg on our face every time. We appealed to the Minister on this issue. One of our most successful services was that from Southend to Frankfurt in Germany. There was a plane to Ostend and then a bus from Ostend to Frankfurt. Despite the wonderful Common Market, which is appreciated by many Ministers, the German Government withdrew the licence for the bus service. We appealed to the Government and asked whether they could get any bus service, run by Germans, French, Austrians or Italians. Sadly, the Government were unable to do so, and the service folded. We were rather unhappy in Southend that when we asked, "Could you please do what we are always told the Common Market can do and give us a bus service run by anybody from Ostend to Frankfurt?" the Government were unable to help.

We appealed to the Government again, saying, "Can you help our transport by getting a third Dartford tunnel?" Instead we find the Government expending all their energies on building the silly Channel tunnel, which nobody wants.

Thirdly, we asked the Government whether we could privatise one of our two railway lines to London. We said, "We are so keen on privatisation in Southend: one of our services is run by British Rail. Can a private firm do the rest?" In their manifesto, the Government said that they would encourage British Rail to privatise passenger services. We wanted a little information from British Rail about the figures. We said to the Government, "Will you ask BR to give us the figures?" The Government said no and that BR was too busy. The privatisation scheme collapsed.

We have had those three refusals from a Minister whom we regard as a real Tory, who believes in privatisation and enterprise. We are beginning to wonder why the Government are picking on us and not helping us in any way in our requests. In this case we ask why we are included in the provision. Why not leave us out?

I should like to know what the Secretary of State meant on Second Reading by saying:

"The directors of the airport company will have a duty under the Companies Acts to act in the best interests of the company, which may not necessarily coincide with the interests of their own local authority." — [Official Report, 27 January 1986; Vol. 90, c. 695.]

That is what sends a shiver down our spines. The one thing that we have asked our airport and our commercial managers to do is have some regard for the people of Southend in the way in which they operate the airport.

Of particular concern to my constituents and those of my right hon. Friend the Member for Southend, West (Mr. Channon), who has taken such an interest in the matter, as he always does in Southend affairs, is the possibility of increased night flights and increased airport noise. Obviously my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, cannot speak on the matter, although I am sure that he would love to do so, but I am sure that we would both like to say: can we have an assurance that, if we are forced to set up a plc, the local authority will still have the power, as a local authority, through planning procedures, to control any upsurge in night flights, which would cause serious concern to the people of Southend? That is one thing on which we need an assurance.

Will the Government put any pressure on Southend borough council, if it is forced to become the sole shareholder of this remarkable new plc, to sell the shares to anybody else? Having built up a successful airport, managed privately and profitably, will we be forced to sell the shares to anyone else?

In view of the great confusion about what is required by the Government and why it has been required, will the Minister be willing to have a discussion with us so that we in Southend could try to find out from him what is involved? I may have been slightly unfair, because it may all be a misunderstanding. Perhaps the Government intend to accept my sensible amendment. We in Southend do not object to the Bill. It is a policy that we have been applying. It is a move towards commercial practice, privatisation and so on. We accept this. We do not oppose this, but we have gone ahead of the Government and have decided that our airport should be managed commercially and privately by and organisation which is not controlled in any way by the Southend borough council and does not have any employees of the Southend borough council.

11.15 pm

What possible advantage can there be in forcing the borough council to spend some of its carefully collected resources on setting up a plc? I know what the Government are trying to do in this clause and I support it but I think they may have made an error in including Southend.

Mr. David Ashby (Leicestershire, North-West): Never.

Mr. Taylor: I can think of no possible argument——

Mr. Ashby: Does my hon. Friend agree that the job of the local council is to provide services and that it is not part of a local council's duty to start providing and running businesses? An airport is run as a business and therefore is it not right that the business should be floated off and not run by the local council?

Mr. Taylor: We do provide commercial services. If my hon. Friend had a local authority which was as successful as Southend, he would have a greater smile on his face. I wonder whether his local authority cut its rates this year? Has his local authority privatised most of its local services?

Mr. Ashby: No.

Mr. Taylor: My hon. Friend would be better employed in inviting his local authority to come on an official visit to Southend to see how a local authority should be run instead of criticising what I am saying.

Southend is a loyal supporter of the commercial policies of the Government and we believe we have given a lead to local authority management in privatisation, profitability and commercial practice. We ask the Government to relieve us of this nonsensical duty to establish a plc with one shareholder. It will bring no benefits to Southend, to the travelling public or to the ratepayers. I hope the Minister will accept this minor amendment.

Mr. Robin Maxwell-Hyslop (Tiverton): My hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor) has deployed the general case which could be applied with equal force to Exeter airport, which is owned by Devon county council.

Exeter airport is extremely ably managed by a commercial company, British Airports International, under an able and experienced manager. It is not only run as an excellent and increasingly excellent business, but it ties in with the policies of the county council under successive administrations — first Conservative and presently a coalition between the Liberals and the Labour party. The county council's policy on this issue has not changed with the change in political control.

All that will be achieved by including Exeter airport within the scope of the Bill will be to interpose an expensive company structure between the present extremely efficient commercial management and the county council. The county council needs to work closely with the airport's commercial management for the purpose of road improvements and the supply of facilities such as policing, through the police authority.

There is bound to be a necessary and close link between the two. Exeter airport may be taken within the ambit of the Bill. Neither the amendments which would have removed it in terms of turnover — the £6 million turnover amendment or the £3 million turnover amendment—have been selected. That is not an avenue open to us to debate or indeed to divide on. Instead, on page 10, after line 36, our amendment states:

"and if the local authority owner has not already made arrangements for the airport to be managed on a commercial basis by a suitably qualified and experienced operator who is not an employee of a local authority."

The Government ceaselessly enjoin on local government, including Devon county council, the utmost economy in its administration. That is the posture that is achieved at the moment vis-a-vis Exeter airport. So, to reject the amendment would be to go counter to the explicit injunctions of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment upon Devon county council as to how it is to arrange its affairs so as to run them at minimum cost.

I am not disputing the suitability of the Bill for the great London airports and many large airports throughout the country. However, it is too often a bad habit of the Government to look at structures in London or the great conurbations and, having satisfied themselves that those require a certain legislative solution and framework, to apply that willy-nilly throughout the United Kingdom, whatever the local conditions may be.

It is most probably the case that when the Bill was drafted the Government did not have in mind Exeter and Southend airports and their particular circumstances, and, of course, officials in Departments never like making exceptions. We would not wish to hybridise the Bill by making the exceptions by name. That would have been an extremely mischievous form of amendment and it would rightly have been rejected on those grounds. But the amendment does no violence at all to the purpose of the Bill. It is the best solution for efficient commercial management of the airports concerned and that is why, if my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary — I see that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State is not with us— is not empowered to accept it, we shall seek to divide the House.

Mr. Snape: I am fascinated by the view expressed by the hon. Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor) in pleading exemption for his airport. That argument is fairly familiar to me. I went to Exeter—I include the hon. Member for Tiverton (Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop) in this—in November last year to speak at the national conference of the Joint Airports Committee of Local Authorities, and a Conservative councillor from Southend made virtually the same points as the hon. Member for Southend, East, although not as well, but one would not expect that.

That councillor asked what a Labour Government would do about an airport such as Southend, which, as the hon. Gentleman has said, has been virtually privatised by the decision of the local authority. While commiserating with that councillor and the hon. Gentleman on the lack of business acumen of Conservative councillors in Southend, who evidently lost an arm and a leg, as the saying goes, trying to run an airport, I said then, and I say now, that a Labour Government would leave the decision on how its airport was run to Southend council. If it felt that the private sector could better run that airport, that is what local government is about.

We do not fear our political opponents making such decisions, but why should Conservative Back Benchers, no matter how distinguished, make special pleas on behalf of their airports? To use the phrase of the hon. Member for Tiverton, to interpose an expensive company structure on the airport to which he referred applies equally to other parts of the country. I do not see why we should specifically exempt the two airports to which the hon. Members for Southend, East and for Tiverton have referred.

We come back to the central question of principle. One either believes in local government democracy, or one does not, and the Government do not. They do not believe in local democracy even in a fairly Right-wing pro-privatisation council such as Southend. The hon. Member for Southend, East read out a litany of allegations against the Government's attitude and their interference in decisions taken by a Conservative-controlled council in a town which has, I am sure, been under Conservative control for many years, if not for ever. That is a salutary lesson for the hon. Gentleman. I feel sorry for him. Life would have been easier for him in many ways if the electors of Glasgow, Cathcart had kept faith with him. He would have been Secretary of State for Scotland now. Instead, as the representative of an English constituency, he has to learn that the Government have no faith in the principles of local government democracy. Regardless of the policies pursued by a local authority, the Secretary of State for Transport knows best. He will ensure that Southend and Exeter airports fall within the remit of the Bill, regardless of the wishes of members of his own party in those areas.

The hon. Member for Gedling (Sir P. Holland) is not with us at present. A few years ago he made his reputation, such as it is, by talking about the number of quangos in Britain, how deplorable they all were, and how the Labour Government persisted in adding to their number. I hazard a guess that if the hon. Member for Gedling was still pursuing that political ploy he would be able to compile a list of quangos created and appointed by the Secretary of State that would exceed the number of quangos created by the last Labour Government. It does not suit his political views for the attention of the public to be drawn to such matters at present, but the hon. Gentleman and his hon. Friend are having to learn a bitter and salutary lesson. Their Government have no faith or interest in local government democracy, and that applies to Conservative-controlled councils as much as to Labour-controlled councils.

The Labour party has no fear of local democracy. Under a Labour Government, if Southend council decided to operate its airport in line with the decisions of locally elected councillors, it would do so with our blessing. The Conservative party has spent most of its largely dishonourable history talking about decentralisation. It is a pity that the Government do not put those ideas into practice, instead of insisting on nationalising airports that are run by their political friends—and, as we have just heard, very properly run.

Sir Peter Emery (Honiton): Exeter airport was in my constituency before the most recent alteration of boundaries moved it into the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Tiverton (Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop). The airport has been privately managed, and managed very successfully, with the co-operation of Devon county council. The Government have not enabled it to be as much improved as we would have wished, but it has built up a great degree of business. It is establishing a record of service to the south-west, especially in the summer months when international airlines now fly there for the holiday trade.

I can understand the Government's wishes to have powers within the Bill which they could implement if management was not good, or if the operation was unsuccessful or was held by the county and was not working well. However, I would have hoped that the Government would be wise enough to see that where local authorities with airports under their control have put them out to private management, and, as my hon. Friend the

[Sir Peter Emery]

Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor) said, really privatised them in form, the powers under the Bill should not be used for those airports.

I hope that the amendment will not be necessary, and that instead we may have an assurance from the Minister that where we have a properly operating commercial organisation running a local airport he will encourage it to continue, without have to use any "draconian" powers to force it to do things which might be unnecessary. I hope that we may have that assurance, because it would be very helpful.

11.30 pm

Mr. Stephen Ross: I have great sympathy with these amendments, but, like the hon. Member for West Bromwich, East (Mr. Snape), having been a member of the Select Committee on Transport and having visited Manchester and Birmingham often, as indeed other airports, I have to admit that they are extremely well run. Anyone who has been to Birmingham recently will say that the management of Elmdon airport is of the highest calibre. These organisations are being forced to set up plcs. It is an expensive operation. I have seen what I think was merchant bankers' advice to Manchester. There was a substantial figure involved and their advice was not to do it. Obviously, Manchester will be forced to do it by this Bill.

I ask the Minister to think again about the other amendments—which were not called tonight but which were debated in Committee—putting a limit on the throughput, or on the £1 million or £2 million turnover. I do not know the figure for Southend or for Exeter. I am sure that they are extremely well run. They should not be forced to change their present structure, when they have been run in a way which is considered very satisfactory by both local Members and the councils involved. I hope that one day we shall even manage to do something in the Isle of Wight; we are hoping to get Brymon to join us with one of the planes from Exeter or Plymouth.

I would ask the Minister, when he replies, to give some undertaking to reconsider this and try to introduce amendments in the other place to cover the issue. It is wrong to force these people into this sort of expenditure when they have done a perfectly good job, and are running the airports efficiently, either personally or through subsidiary companies.

Mr. Steen: I agree with the comments of my hon. Friends, particularly in relation to Exeter airport, which I use fairly frequently.

If the Minister feels that he cannot go along with these amendments, what we would like him to say is that a way can be found whereby Exeter and Southend, among others, which are, in effect, already privatised, can become plcs without extra expense. The Government must not encourage further public expenditure on operations that are already privatised. The Government are, quite rightly, very concerned to cut public expenditure. They should not now force more public expenditure on local authorities and airports which are, in effect, already privatised. We want to hear from the Minister tonight that he will find some formula, by the time this Bill gets to another place——

Mr. Ashby rose——

Mr. Steen: I will give way in a moment. I hope that the Minister will find some formula whereby the extra costs which must be incurred by these two airports, at least, do not fall upon the ratepayers.

Mr. Ashby: Would my hon. Friend not agree that if these local airports were properly privatised, with their equity placed on the market and offered to the public, such expenditure would not fall on the public purse but on the private purse, and all the problems which he envisages would go away?

Mr. Teddy Taylor: Mr. Deputy Speaker——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Member must confine himself to one speech. He cannot intervene on an intervention.

Mr. Steen: Before I respond to my hon. Friend, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I am sure that my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor) can help me.

Mr. Taylor: Does my hon. Friend the Member for Leicestershire, North-West (Mr. Ashby) appreciate that once again his intervention has been inadvertently designed to mislead the House? The Minister made it abundantly clear on Second Reading on 27 January that these companies would continue to be wholly owned by the relevant local authorities. So we are not selling to different shareholders. We will have one shareholder company owned by the ratepayers of Southend. To that extent once again the intervention is mischievous and designed simply to delay the House.

Mr. Steen: Rather than get involved in the dispute between my hon. Friends, I shall sit down because it may be a suitable time to hear what the Minister has to say.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: The Minister may save himself some anxiety because I shall come to his aid by saying how much I endorse the amendment proposed by the hon. Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor). Irrespective of whether it has much to commend it in the interests of Southend as an airport, it certainly has a great deal to commend it in regard to Manchester airport. It will not have escaped the Minister's notice that Manchester airport is run by a private company totally at arm's length from the local authority. The local authority made arrangements for the airport to be managed commercially by a suitably qualified and experienced operator who is not an employee of the local authority.

I welcome the amendment and look forward to the hon. Gentleman pressing it to a vote. He would have the support of all hon. Members who have the interests of Manchester at heart because it would take Manchester airport outside the Bill. I have considerable sympathy with what the hon. Gentleman is trying to do, which is to defend the interests of the area which he represents. I endorse that because that is his role in the House. I wish to do the same for the airport in my area. The hon. Gentleman and I are at one in recognising that the effect of the Bill will be totally mischievous. It has little merit for the airports at Southend, Manchester and Exeter.

Mr. Snape: I do not seek to interrupt the able speech of my hon. Friend without good reason. Is he aware that the hon. Member for Tiverton (Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop) has said that the Bill will impose an expensive company structure on Exeter? Does my hon. Friend agree that it will also impose something similar on Manchester and other airports unless the amendment is accepted because considerable extra corporation tax and value added tax will result as a direct consequence of the airports being included in the Bill? Where is the efficiency there?

Mr. Lloyd: My hon. Friend has made an important point. What makes it even more ludicrous than Conservative Members may realise is that Manchester has already incurred considerable expense because of the Government's action in having driven it to set up its present structure. Despite the fact that Manchester has paid for some of the best—qualified company lawyers in Britain to give advice on the optimal structure to serve the interests of shareholders, the travelling public and the nation, the Government are not satisfied. They have a doctrinaire view of airports policy.

The Government have a particularly peculiar view of a company's relationship with a local authority. They do not accept that an airport run by a company at arm's length from a local authority should have a company structure which is recognisable in any shape or form as being equivalent to a company which ordinary company law establishes. The Government have a warped view of a company. They insist that local democracy is as nought and that the local authority—be it Southend, Exeter or Manchester—is not in a position to make arrangements for its own area and community. Because the Government do not trust local democracy, the owners of Manchester airport, who are the ratepayers in the former Greater Manchester area, will be put to considerable expense.

I endorse the views of the hon. Gentleman in moving this amendment. I only regret that the Government do not wish to recognise that there will be burdens on the smaller airports. The hon. Member for Isle of Wight (Mr. Ross) raised the point in Committee that we should do something for the smaller airports. Because the Government do not accept those arguments and because they will impose these costs on smaller airports and in no circumstances allow a loophole which would operate in the interests of Manchester, I regret to have to say that I suspect that the hon. Gentleman's amendment, ingenious as it is, will get very short shrift from the Minister.

Mr. Michael Spicer: I concede straight away that, as my hon. Friends the Members for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor) and for Tiverton (Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop) have said—and I know that this view is held by my right hon. Friend the Member for Southend, West (Mr. Channon) and by my hon. Friend the Member for Honiton (Sir P. Emery) — British Airports International has done a remarkable job at the two airports referred to. The achievement at Southend is particularly remarkable because a loss-making airport has been turned into a profit-making airport. That is a very successful operation, and I certainly want to associate myself with the tributes that have been paid in this connection.

I am quite sure that Exeter is doing a good job. I have visited the airport and, like the hon. Member for West Bromwich, East (Mr. Snape), I have been impressed by what is happening there. It must be said, however—and I am sure that this will be conceded by my hon. Friends from the west country—that the Exeter airport is still making a loss of about £360,000 out of an annual income of approximately £1 million. My hon. Friend the Member for Tiverton says that it is just under £2 million. His information may be better than mine, but I shall get confirmation of my figures.

My view is that there is still some considerable way to go at Exeter. It is quite remarkable that a city in the heart of one of Britain's great tourist areas should have only a minimal amount of inbound, particularly foreign, tourists coming through its airport.

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: One of the reasons is that my hon. Friend refused permission for this. The Spanish tourist company that wanted to put down there before going on to Cardiff was refused permission to do so by him. Therefore, it does not lie in his mouth to criticise the absence of foreign tourists.

Mr. Spicer: My hon. Friend is not living up to his normal standards of fairness in this matter. What he said is perfectly true, but the reason is that the Spanish do not give us comparable rights to pick up people at their airports and take them on to different points. The normal rules under which European traffic is conducted provide that one is not allowed to pick up passengers in another country and carry them on within that country. That is standard practice, even if Exeter thinks that its future lies in breaking those rules. To some extent I would accept that our objective is to get far greater freedom in picking up and putting down passengers within other countries, but that is a long way off. My hon. Friend has not put forward a very strong point there.

It is one thing for me to congratulate the airports on what they have achieved through contracted managment, but my hon. Friends go on to ask why the matter should not be left there. Why do they insist on setting up these companies as public limited companies? The answers are very clear. First, it is only if they are set up as public limited companies that they come under the disciplines of the Companies Acts. Involved here is the Companies Acts accounting system.

More important is the matter to which my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East referred — the responsibility of directors. He said, somewhat strangely for him, that he could not see that there would necessarily be any distinction between the objectives of a director operating on behalf of his airport company and the objectives of the local authority. I should have thought there might be many places where the commercial interests of an airport were at variance with the interests of the local authority. For example, in investment, dividend and other policies a distinction might well be made. Under the Companies Acts, the directors of a company have a duty to act in the interests not of the local authorities which are the owners but of the company for which they are responsible.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: As a company director myself, I ask whether there is not an obligation to the shareholders of the company. If the Government are going to set up a company, in which the only shareholder is the Southend council, where is the difference?

Mr. Spicer: The interest ultimately comes back to the shareholders, but a distinction has to be drawn. I am sure my hon. Friend, when he thinks this through, will accept that there may well be cases where the council will wish, for instance, to cream off all the income from the airport, whereas the directors, acting as directors responsible for the well-being of the company and of the shareholders, would wish to retain and reinvest those profits. The hon.

[Mr. Spicer]

Member for Stretford (Mr. Lloyd) referred to Manchester in this connection. On this point, I do not think there can be a great difference between us. There may well be a conflict of interest between the financial policy of a council and that of a company.

A more substantial point is that one of the unashamed reasons for the Government wanting to set up public limited companies is that we think that that would make it easier—and it would be beneficial for it to be made easier—for those shares to be sold to the private sector. There is nothing in the Bill and it is not our intention to force local authorities to sell shares, although later amendments ask us to do precisely that. Unless the Government are defeated on that issue, they do not intend to compel the sale of shares. However, we shall deal with that matter soon.

We certainly intend to set up structures with shareholdings which will make it easier to sell those companies to the private sector. There is nothing in our proposals that will make contracted management difficult. We think that our proposals will encourage airports to contract management. One of the incentives may well be the ability at some time for the managers of contracted management companies to have a stake in the airports. That could be a great incentive for them. My hon. Friend will be aware that the arrangements at Southend involve management in the airport's finances and future. We certainly see no reason why that should not be extended to shareholding. That would be a good way for a successful management company to be involved in the future of an airport.

Mr. Steen: Does my hon. Friend believe that if Exeter were privatised, as the Bill would have it, instead of losing £300,000, it might make a profit?

Mr. Spicer: I am sure that it was a slip of the tongue which made my hon. Friend talk of privatisation. We are talking not of privatisation at this stage but of a transfer to Companies Acts companies. I envisage Exeter continuing as it is. Through a contracted management team, which knows an awful lot about running airports, the airport's finances will improve, one hopes rapidly and, once it moves into profit, the contracting management may well wish to take a shareholding. That could well be good for Exeter and the airport's future.

Mr. Snape: For the enlightenment of the Minister's colleagues from that part of the world and us, will he say whether he believes that there is something inherently inefficient in how Exeter is run at present and whether something that is being done wrong has made it lose £330,000 in the current year?

Mr. Spicer: That is not for me to say with precision, but I am happy to answer the hon. Gentleman. He might have talked to the managers. I suspect that they would say that Exeter's capability to market itself in, perhaps, foreign countries, exists. I think I am right in saying that an airport that does not receive any direct flights from overseas has some scope in terms of marketing its services.

Sir Peter Emery: Although not on a scheduled service, the airport receives direct flights from Spain by the Spanish national airline. The service has been developed by the present contracting company.

Mr. Spicer: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. I should have said scheduled services. I am trying not to imply criticism. I was asked whether there was any scope for improvement, and my humble opinion is that there probably is.

I am confident that the hon. Member for Stretford was not trying to be helpful when he said that if the two aiports were exempted, we would be making two classes of airport above the £1 million turnover threshold. I shall deal with the argument of the hon. Member for Isle of Wight (Mr. Ross) about raising the threshold shortly. A business with a turnover of £1 million is reasonable. Airports of that size employ an average of 40 people. In the private sector, there is not much problem about a business of that size being subjected to Companies Acts disciplines. We do not think that it is unreasonable to ask such businesses to become Companies Acts companies. Of course, the higher the threshold, the greater the number of anomalies.

Before BAI took over, Southend was open 24 hours a day. The new management has cut the hours of opening from 6 am to 10 pm. The new management has discretion over hours, and that is part of the contract that it has with the local council. I assume my hon. Friend is correct in saying that the local council is the planning authority and that the planning authority would ultimately have the power to impose any night bans.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: My hon. Friend must be aware that Southend airport is in the borough of Rochford.

Mr. Spicer: If that borough is the planning authority, it will have the power to impose night bans. The planning authority has the power to impose whatever restrictions it desires.

There is nothing in the Bill to prevent my right hon. Friend from designating these airports, if he so wishes, to be under the direct control of the Secretary of State. I hasten to add that he has no intention of doing that. He has only designated London airports for that purpose. There is nothing in the Bill that would change the present position in connection with control over night flights.

With that assurance and in view of my answers to the various points that have been raised in this important debate, I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East will feel able to withdraw the amendment.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

Clause 14

TRANSFER SCHEMES

Mr. Ashby: I beg to move amendment No. 71, in page 11, line 20, after 'providing', insert '(a)'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this we may take the following amendments:

No. 72, in page 11, line 23, at end insert—

'(b) for the placement on offer to the public of not less than two-thirds of the equity of the company.'.

No. 73, in page 11, line 29, at end insert

and to any employees' share scheme as defined in section 19(6).'.

Mr. Ashby: The effect of the amendments is to force municipal authorities that are the owners of the airport plcs to provide within the scheme for the Secretary of State to offer to the public not less than two thirds of the equity of the company. Within the scheme there should be included an employees' share scheme as defined in clause 19(6).

There is a provision in part II of the Bill which has been described as having the effect of privatising municipal airports, but it will do nothing of the sort. It will merely make the companies subsidiaries of the councils. They will be quasi quangos and they will be 100 per cent. owned by the councils. Many of the councils are of a political nature which is such that they will never give up one share or ever introduce any private capital into the airports.

I heard the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor), and I praise the Southend council. It must be a sheer delight to have a council which has reduced rates and is running its affairs as well as has been described by my hon. Friend. However, councils throughout the country, left, right and centre, are not doing what they are supposed to be doing, which is providing services. They are straying more and more into areas to which they are not suited. If an airport company is well run, it is wrong that it should be a subsidiary of the council and part of the services of the council. That is not what a council is supposed to do. The airport company should be floated and should go properly into the private sector, which is what my amendments propose.

Unlike Southend, I suffer in Leicestershire from a hung county council where the Conservatives wanted to put up rates by 10 per cent. but the Liberals combined with Labour to put them up by 31 per cent. I suffer from a hung district council within which is the East Midlands airport, where the Conservatives wanted to put the rates up by a modest 9 per cent. and the Liberals combined with Labour to put them up by 28 per cent. I applaud the Southend council, but my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East must realise that not all councils are run like the Southend council. The Bill has to make provision for everyone if it is not to be a hybrid Bill, which is why I propose my amendments.

On Second Reading the Secretary of State set out the objectives for privatising the British Airports Authority. He said:

"It is high time that we changed the regime under which it operates to liberate management from the constraints of public ownership. Our objective must be to remove the burden of political interference and state control so that airports, airlines and their customers can reap the benefits."

I fail to understand why there should be one rule for the BAA and another for the municipally run airports. In the public's eye, there is little difference between a Government-run airport and municipally-owned airport. If those are the reasons for privatising BAA, how much more must those reasons prevail in the case of most of the municipal airports?

Many of the municipal airports are run by local authorities which are Labour controlled and will perhaps remain Labour controlled for some time. The Labour party is a byword for "political interference" in commercial decisions. What hopes are there of no "political interference" in the running of the airports under a Labour-controlled council? The phrase has little meaning when we look at Labour-controlled councils up and down the country. We never see a liberated management. We see control after control.

"to liberate management from the constraints of public ownership"

Therefore, the Bill as drafted gives very little hope for the plcs and airports. They will not have liberated management or be free from political control. Most airports will be run in much the same way as they have been hitherto. I can see no logical or coherent reason why those airports should not be privatised.

12.15 am

On Second Reading, the Secretary of State said:

"The Bill also ensures that there is a proper ars's length relationship between the new airport companies and their parent authorities".

As I know that Hansard is always totally correct, I must assume that that is a proper reflection of what the Minister feels about that part of the Bill. I agree with him that there is "a proper ars's length relationship between the new airport companies and their parent authorities".—[Official Report, 27 January 1986; Vol. 90, c. 691-5.]

Frankly, that reflects the way that I feel about the Bill. That was no Freudian slip. Truth will out in the end.

Let us consider the many measures that have been taken. The local authorities are always servants of Government and subject to the law. The Government have done a great deal, rightly, to control local authorities. They have attempted to control some of their most profligate expenditure. In council housing, legislation has forced local authorities to sell local authority housing——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman must relate what he is saying to the amendment.

Mr. Ashby: With great respect, I am referring to the sale of a council's shares to the public.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. Gentleman is referring to the sale of council houses, as far as I can hear.

Mr. Ashby: With respect, I am relating the sale of council shares to, and comparing it with, the Government's legislation that has ordered local authorities to sell houses. Obviously, I expressed myself very badly. I shall start again.

If there is any complaint that my amendment forces local authorities to sell property that is theirs, one has only to look at housing legislation to see that there are precedents for that. The Government have forced local authorities to sell houses to those who live in them. There are many precedents. My amendment provides for an employees' scheme, which is almost exactly the same as the sale of council houses.

Mr. Robert Hughes: If I follow the hon. Gentleman's analogy correctly, is he arguing that the people who work at the airports should be sold the airports at discount prices?

Mr. Ashby: Employees at an airport should be part of any such scheme. There is provision for it in clause 19(6) of the Bill. I am merely asking that any sale of the shares should embrace clause 19(6). It is already in the Bill. I am asking for nothing more than is in the Bill. There is plenty of precedent for such sales. The inclusion of an employees' scheme is almost exactly as provided in the sale of council housing.

I refer to my authority, the East Midlands airport authority. In north-west Leicestershire, we have East Midlands airport owned by Derbyshire, Nottinghamshire and Leicestershire county councils—not in equal shares. It is largely owned by Nottinghamshire and Derbyshire. Leicestershire owns only a few shares. The benefit for Leicestershire is that it gets the rates from the airport.

The East Midlands airport makes a profit of about £2 million, but what happens to that money? Most of it goes to Derbyshire or Nottinghamshire and little stays in north-west Leicestershire. It appears that Nottinghamshire county council has spent £20,000 on CND and £600,000 on revamping the market square—it is a fine market square and I do not see the need for the work. That is an absolute disgrace. It is also spending £120,000 on modernising the already fine council offices. They are examples of the recent profligacy of the Nottinghamshire county council.

Where does Derbyshire's share of the £2 million go? It has taken on 700 new staff. It has spent £50,000 on recalling the school stationery to overprint on it "Derbyshire supports a nuclear free zone". It has circulated a free newspaper, a party political paper, called Insight. That is where the money is going.

Those councils pay lip service to the airport and they are creaming off the profits and using them to offset their profligate spending. There are no benefits for the people living in the area.

The councils will argue that there has been some capital investment, but it is always too little too late. The airport is in the centre of a road network—just off the M1 and close to the M6. It is in the centre of England and is ideally placed to be a cargo airport. It is a successful airport, but it could be more successful. It needs a dynamic approach. A plc with a number of councils as shareholders and directors will not do much good.

What sort of people will be the directors of the company? Largely they will come from the Derbyshire and Nottinghamshire county councils. They will be social workers who have never run a business in their lives and who do not have a clue how to do so. It is wonderful to be a bus driver, but one has to know something to be a director.

Mr. Snape: I notice from one of the reference books that the hon. Gentleman is a company director. Perhaps he could tell us what qualities he possesses which make him more suitable to be a company director than, for example, a bus driver or a social worker?

Mr. Ashby: My qualification is that I have some experience of running a business.

The directors of the plc must have experience of running a business. We are told that some of the existing directors of the airport will be on the board, but there will be others representing the owners, the shareholders. They have control, but they have no business experience. The present chairman of the joint airports authority is a very nice man with "love" and "hate" written on the knuckles of each hand. I often wonder what the airport director feels when he sees those words when decisions are being taken. We must have people with business acumen and experience.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am having great difficulty in relating what the hon. Gentleman is saying to the amendments. We are discussing not the principles of the Bill but the amendments.

Mr. Ashby: If the shares are offered to the public, the directors will reflect the ownership of the shares. In the natural course of events, like any public limited company, one would expect to see directors with a wide range of business experience; people who have put money into the company. That is why I say that the sort of people who will be on the board will be people with that business experience. That is what the airports will require. They will require the business experience which they do not have at the moment. Being run as a service at the moment is doing them a disservice because they are not able to achieve their full management or investment potential. There are great limitations on the investment which they can get unless they are prepared to go out for private investment. Unless they are prepared to do that, they will have no future.

As the airports are set up at the moment, there is little hope for them. We see no change, just disadvantage. We simply have to make those local authorities part with their shares to the general public to be able to free the airports from their constraints, otherwise we are wasting our time.

Mr. Tony Favell (Stockport): I rise to support my hon. Friend the Member for Leicestershire, North-West (Mr. Ashby). I have been consistent from the time that the Bill was first published and debated within the Department in suggesting that the municipal airports should be released from the dead hand of the local authorities.

The Bill is a great missed opportunity for the municipal airports. Its main thrust has my heartfelt support. One of the Government's great achievements has been their privatisation programme. That will go down in history. The privatisation of the BAA will go down as an enormous success. But success for the BAA will mean dismal failure for the municipal airports which are being put at an enormous disadvantage as a result of the Bill.

Stansted, Gatwick and Heathrow, in the hands of Sir Norman Payne and his gang will be an enormous success. They are all good business men who know what they are doing. The running of an airport is big business. It is not like running a bus station or even a small railway station. It needs to be run by people who know the business intimately and know what they are doing.

Mr. Stephen Ross: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Hon. Members: Oh no.

Mr. Ross: Yes, because it is about time somebody stood up for local government. What is wrong with the present management of Manchester or Birmingham or Newcastle airports? Answer that.

Mr. Favell: They are run as good municipal airports at the moment. They are run for the benefit of the local people. But the people who run them do not have the expertise to run airports as big business and to attract business from elsewhere in the country.

Let us take the example of Atlanta in the United States. That has a population of about 1 million, yet the airport sees 12, 13 or 14 times as many people go through that airport each year because it is run as a business. The people who run it bring prosperity, people and jobs to the area. For Manchester, the Bill is a great lost opportunity. Enormous employment opportunities could be brought to Manchester airport if only it was run as a business, not merely as a municipal facility.

There are other disadvantages in the Bill for the municipal airports. For example, being turned into plcs, they will now have to pay corporation tax. That will be an enormous disadvantage. They are being put at great disadvantage as against the BAA airports. It is a tragedy. If there was any chance of Ken Livingstone running Heathrow, Gatwick or Stansted, all hell would be let loose. There would be no question of the GLC or its successors running the three main airports of the south-east. It is a tragedy that Manchester and other municipal airports should be put in the hands of Left-wing authorities such as Manchester city council. We shall live to rue the day. We are giving the south-east an advantage over the regions. I support my hon. Friend's amendment.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The Government sympathise very much with what my hon. Friends are saying. In particular the Government agree about the desirability of privatisation. We have already made that clear. Clause 24 makes it clear that the local authorities, when they sell their shares in airports, cannot impose within the memorandum and articles of association restrictions on who may buy the shares. One of the aspects of the original Manchester scheme with which we were not happy was the fact that it seemed to restrict the sale of shares to the public sector. We agree, therefore, about the objective.

I am not as pessimistic as my hon. Friends about the possibility of even Labour councils eventually seeing some of the benefits of privatisation. The development of the airport would be outside public sector controls. There could be employee participation in shareholding. It would be possible to attract capital and turn loss-making airports into profit-making ones, and to use the moneys currently used to subsidise airports—10 out of 16 make losses at the moment—for better social purposes. Even Labour councils may eventually see the advantages of either partial or total sale of shares in their airports.

My hon. Friend the Member for Leicestershire, North-West (Mr. Ashby) asked why there should be one rule for the BAA and another rule for municipal owners. The answer is that the Government own the BAA and therefore have the right to sell the airports. Depending on one's view about local authority independence, one may or may not take the view that one should compel local authorities to act against their will. I concede that that is a matter for debate among my hon. Friends. However, giving people the right to buy the houses they live in is a different matter from compelling airport owners to sell their assets when, for instance, there may not be a ready buyer. That may well be the case with the 10 airports that are making a loss. For those reasons, I would——

Mr. Ashby: I thought that I had covered that. It would be part of the scheme, would it not? If the airport was a loss-maker, that would be part of the scheme, and there would have to be provision perhaps for the sale of the shares in two or three years' time on a given scale, when one could see the way in which things were going.

Mr. Spicer: My hon. Friend must at least concede that he made a direct comparison with the sale of council houses and that, in that case, it is a question of the right to buy. There is implicit in that system a buyer. Such a buyer is not implicit in the compulsory sale provisions that he wishes to introduce. So because we have taken the view that we cannot, to this extent, interfere with the independence and autonomy of local authorities—and that is a pretty fundamental decision that we have had to take—we could not, therefore, go along with these amendments, which are aimed precisely at compelling local authorities to sell.

Having said all that, however, I must repeat to the House and to my hon. Friends that it is, of course, our objective—and it is one of the reasons for setting these companies up as public limited companies—that a very large proportion of the shares should be owned by the private sector.

I hope, therefore, that on the basis of what I have said my hon. Friend will feel able to withdraw his amendment.

Mr. Ashby: I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 16

CONTROL OVER CONSTITUTION AND ACTIVITIES OF PUBLIC AIRPORT COMPANIES

Mr. Michael Spicer: I beg to move amendment No. 10, in page 13, line 14 after '(1)', insert 'Subject to subsection (1A),'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take Government amendments Nos. 11 and 12.

Mr. Spicer: Because these are simple amendments, perhaps I can address myself briefly to amendments Nos. 11 and 12, which are the substantive ones.

The purpose of amendment No. 11 is to ensure that the minimum number of directors who are employees and are to be appointed to the board of a public airport company under subsection (1) are suitably experienced in airport management. The whole purpose of the subsection is to ensure that airport company boards contain a minimum element of practical airport experience. It would be in the interests of neither the company, the employees nor the ratepayers if this important objective were to be frustrated by the appointment of employees who lacked experience of airport management. I hope that the House will be able to accept the amendment.

Amendment No. 12 is a rather different proposition. In Committee, in response to an amendment proposed by my hon. Friend the Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker) I undertook to look again at the provision in subsection (1) for a minimum number of public airport company directors to be drawn from full-time employees. My hon. Friend pinpointed the problem, which is that a local authority which had contracted out the management of its airport—the issue which we have just debated, and I should perhaps have said earlier that we wanted to make to this concession those who had contracted-out management—would be unlikely to have sufficient qualified employees within the public airport company to satisfy the requirement in the subsection that three, or one quarter of the directors should be full-time employees.

We have considered the problem carefully and we believe that it can be tackled by providing that if the Secretary of State is satisfied that appropriate arrangements for the management of the airport have been made, he may direct that an exemption from the provision of subsection (1) be granted to the controlling authority concerned. That is precisely in response to the point raised by my hon. Friend in Committee, and what this amendment aims to do.

Amendment agreed to.

' (1A) Where at any time it appears to the Secretary of State—

(a) that a public airport company has made arrangements for the management of the airport operated by it to be carried on otherwise than through its officers or employees and

(b) that any such arrangements are adequate to secure that those participating in the management of the airport under the arrangements are suitably qualified to do so by virtue of their experience in airport management, the Secretary of State may direct that subsection (1) shall not apply in relation to that company.

(1B) Any direction given by the Secretary of State under subsection (1A) may provide—

(a) that it is to have effect only for such period, or in such circumstances, as may be specified in it, or

(b) that its continuation in force is to be subject to compliance with such conditions specified in it as the Secretary of State thinks fit.'. — [Mr. Michael Spicer.]

Clause 17

DISABILITIES OF DIRECTORS OF PUBLIC AIRPORT COMPANIES

Mr. Snape: I beg to move amendment No. 13, in page 14, leave out lines 13 and 14.

The effect of the amendment would be to limit the constraints imposed on directors under subsection (2) to abandoning their participation in discussions on contracts between the company or a subsidiary and the council and voting on any such contract. In response to a similar amendment that we moved in Committee the Under-Secretary of State for Scotland said that the Bill

"will allow members of principal councils, who are also airport directors, to take part in the consideration of matters relating to their airports, other than matters of contracts or proposed contracts between the airport company and the council. This was done deliberately to allow the maximum informed discussion on airport matters."—[Official Report, Standing Committee J, 6 March 1986; c. 411.]

He later said that the Government would consider whether they could move some way in the direction suggested by the amendment. The Minister implied that the part of the clause which the amendment would delete applied only to subsection (2)(b). Confirmation is required from the Under-Secretary.

There are similarities between what the Government seek to do in this Bill and the Transport Act 1985, which requires the establishment of operating companies for the provision of bus services and places similar constraints to those in this Bill on the ability of elected councillors who are directors of the operating company to discuss and to vote at council meetings on matters related to the company. The Transport Act includes a section which enables the Secretary of State for Transport to issue a dispensation from those constraints. The Under-Secretary replied in Committee to an amendment designed to insert a similar clause in the Bill.

Sir Peter Blaker (Blackpool, South): I intervene briefly to seek clarification of the effect of the clause as it stands, because of my interest in Blackpool airport, which has not been mentioned today. Like many other holiday resorts, Blackpool has an airport. Historically, holiday resorts have provided the infrastructure for their regions for the benefit of tourism and more recently for conference business. This goes back to the last century, and is not confined to airports.

Sometimes, the airports run at a deficit. Blackpool airport runs at a loss, although this year the loss is very small. We hope to move more regularly into profit in future if the exploration for further gas resources and oil in the Irish sea is successful.

The consequence of Blackpool running its own airport in the circumstances and for the purposes that I have described is that it is frequently discussed by Blackpool borough council. It is not irrelevant either that the airport provides more than 300 jobs. Therefore, it is important to Blackpool council and to the airport to know exactly the effect of the clause. As I understand it, while the clause means that a councillor who is also a director of the airport may not take part in discussions on a proposed contract between the council and the independent airport, and may not vote on a question involving a contract, he may take part in discussions which involve other airports matters; for example, airport policy, which is discussed frequently by Blackpool council.

This is an important question, not only on its own merits, but especially because of the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor) when he referred to what the Secretary of State said on the Second Reading about the duty of directors lying principally to the company and not necessarily to the council, if they are councillors. I should be grateful if my hon. Friend would confirm that my understanding of the clause is correct.

Mr. Ancram: It might be helpful to my right hon. Friend the Member for Blackpool, South (Sir P. Blaker) if I briefly restate the purpose of the clause, although his reading of it was very accurate.

The purpose of clause 17 is to safeguard the highest standards of probity in the conduct of public business as it relates to public airport companies. Clause 17(2) is concerned with maintaining those standards at meetings of councils when the affairs of airport companies are under discussion.

Like the Transport Act—the hon. Member for West Bromwich, East (Mr. Snape) is correct in saying that there are some similarities—the clause prohibits councillors who are also directors of associated public airport companies from voting when matters of contract between their council and their company are under discussion. Like the Transport Act, it prohibits their taking part in discussion on any such contracts, but, unlike the Transport Act — and my right hon. Friend the Member for Blackpool, South made this distinction—it allows them freedom to take part in discussion and consideration of matters other than matters of contract—indeed, the sort of matters to which he was referring. This was a deliberate change to allow the maximum informed discussion on airport matters. I hope that that will satisfy my right hon. Friend's constituents.

I have to say to the hon. Member for West Bromwich, East that I think that we have gone far enough. I do not think that we should remove the prohibition on councillors, who are also directors, voting on airport matters other than contracts. I apprciate that I undertook in Committee that the Government would consider whether we could move towards providing a path for the Secretary of State to issue exemptions from the provisions of clause 17(2). We gave very careful consideration to that matter. Having listened carefully to the arguments in Committee and to the arguments put forward by the hon. Gentleman tonight, I do not think, on balance, that the potential benefits outweigh the dangers of enhanced liability to conflicts of interest. It is for that reason that we do not propose to amend the clause.

Like the hon. Gentleman, I re-read the debate in Committee. It appears to me that the misunderstanding that may have given rise to the debate in the Committee was that there was no distinction between this Bill and the Transport Act. I hope that tonight I have at least cleared that up. In the light of what I have said, I hope that the hon. Gentleman will withdraw the amendment.

Mr. Snape: The Department of Transport's circular 4/1985, which deals with these matters, says:

"Members wishing in exceptional circumstances to vote on any matter or to speak on a matter excluded from the dispensation . . . may apply to the Secretary of State".

What is the difference between the two pieces of legislation so far as this dispensation is concerned? Why is it regarded as permissible under the Transport Act 1985, but as something perhaps dangerous—if that is the right word—under this Bill?

Mr. Ancram: I do not want to rehearse the arguments that we had in the Committee on this subject. I think it was a matter of agreement between the two sides in Committee that this is an area in which probity is very important. The Transport Act was rather stricter in these terms than this Bill. It was felt that in terms of the management of airports councillors who were directors should be allowed to take part in discussions relating to airports, but where voting is concerned — and obviously voting has some implications in itself—the restrictions should be made.

Mr. Snape: I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 20

Local authority financial controls in England and Wales

Mr. Snape: I beg to move amendment No. 14, in page 16, line 19, after 'company', insert 'formed under section 12'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this we may take the following amendments:

No. 15, in page 16, line 22, after 'of', insert 'such'.

No. 16, in page 16, line 27, after 'company', insert 'formed under section 12'.

No. 17, in page 16, line 29, after 'of', insert 'such'.

No. 18, in page 17, line 3, at end insert—

'(3A) Where any public airport company is not formed under section 12, then, for the purposes of Part VIII of that Act—

(a) any amount—

(i) being an advance of capital nature made to the company or a subsidiary of subsidiary of the company by the controlling authority of that company, or

(ii) raised by the issue of any securities by the company or a subsidiary of the company to the controlling authority of that company, shall be treated as prescribed expenditure of the controlling authority of that company, and

(b) any amount repaid by the company or a subsidiary of the company in respect of any such advance as is mentioned in paragraph (a)(i) shall be treated as a capital receipt of the controlling authority of that company in accordance with subsection (2), but

(c) no expenditure incurred or amount received by the authority for the purposes of or in connection with the company other than such expenditure or receipts as are mentioned in paragraphs (a) and (b) shall be treated as prescribed expenditure or capital receipts of the authority;

Provided that such a public airport company shall not borrow or raise any amounts other than as mentioned in paragraph (a) without the consent of the Secretary of State who shall exercise the power of giving consent to any borrowing in the national interest.'.

Mr. Snape: The purpose of this amendment and those associated with it is threefold. First, it is to preserve the local authority's right to form proper independent companies. This would overcome what we consider to be the ludicrous argument that a company is independent only when shares are vested in the private sector. We believe that the private sector's willingness to invest in any trading undertaking is dependent upon the viability and status of that undertaking and not on who owns the shares. We can give as an example the success of private involvement in Manchester airport plc.

The second purpose of the amendments is to free such independent companies from the constraints of local authority capital expenditure controls. We believe it is nonsense that an independent company should compete for borrowing power approvals with highway authorities, for example, up and down the country. Building terminals at airports surely should not be equated with maintaining roads. The existing funding arrangements for airports in fact acknowledge this point.

Thirdly, we recognise that the Secretary of State will not wish to give up some control over the activities of independent companies. That is the sentiment behind this Bill, as it is behind other privatisation measures that the Government have introduced. These amendments are designed to provide for advances made to an independent company other than by a local authority. We accept that as prescribed expenditure. The Secretary of State should be asked for his consent to such expenditure. He could exercise his power to consent to such borrowings in the national interest in exactly the same way as is provided for in clause 9(1) in connection with the BAA holding company when it is wholly owned by the Government. We believe that such an approach would have the virtue of consistency and would go a long way to meet the criticism that the Secretary of State is being less than even-handed in his approach to local authority airports compared with his approach to those airports owned by the British Airports Authority.

Sir Peter Blaker: I have a relatively brief point of clarification. This clause tightens up the rules relating to what will be treated as prescribed capital expenditure by a local authority when it comes to capital expenditure for its airport. Again, this is relevant to Blackpool airport. I would like from the Minister an assurance that the airport pool will still be available for the local authorities for the purposes of borrowing for capital spending. I am thinking particularly of smaller local authorities such as Blackpool. Will the Government also give an assurance that they will do what they can to ensure that the airport needs of the smaller local authorities, such as Blackpool, are born in mind when the borrowing requirements are being discussed. I have it in mind that Blackpool airport will need soon to spend a large sum on renewing the runway, if it is to remain effective.

Mr. Ridley: The hon. Member for West Bromwich, East (Mr. Snape) moved his group of amendments, the main purpose of which is to allow public airport companies not set up under clause 12 to obtain private capital without that finance counting against the controlling authority's capital allocation. I point out that there is only one such public airport company — Manchester. I do not know why this series of benefits should be extended to Manchester rather than to any other local authority. I do not really need to know why. The reason may be obvious. We hope all our airport companies will look to the private sector to help finance investment, but so long as those companies are subject to local authority control capital finance from any external source, whether from the authority itself or from private sources, counts against the public sector borrowing requirement. This is not because the company may or may not be viable. It is because local authorities enjoy the same credit-worthiness as the Government because of their taxing powers. An investor in an airport company and an authority controlling an airport company will know that the authority stands behind it and guarantees it, as it were, in the same way as the Government stand behind public corporations. Therefore, the clause provides that private capital counts against the controlling authority's capital allocation in the same way as any loan that it might make to the company. There is no difference between the local authority borrowing and the company borrowing because, ultimately, the local authority stands behind both.

Mr. Snape: What is the difference between a plc such as that set up to run Manchester airport and the BAA holding company which, at least initially, is wholly owned by the Government and will presumably be outwith the public sector borrowing requirement? Is the right hon. Gentleman saying that the BAA holding company will still be part of the PSBR for financial purposes?

Mr. Ridley: As long as the BAA holding company is in the public sector, it will be part of the PSBR and any borrowing that it undertakes will count against public expenditure. The same applies to any local authority airport company or bus company. As long as the authority holds 51 per cent. or more of the company, its investment will count towards the PSBR. If the company went bust and lost all of the money that had been lent to it, the Government, in the case of the BAA, or the local authority would have to pay off the debt.

The amendment acknowledges that there should be a borrowing consent system. That involves no significant change in the way the system will be now operated. The necessary capital allocations will be given when we judge such loans to be in the national interest and an affordable charge on the PSBR. An authority can enable a company to escape the control on local authority capital expenditure by removing the need—by transferring control to the private sector.

If Blackpool airport has to make investments and the council applies in the normal way for investment control, the projects of national or regional importance system will apply. We have very nearly always authorised airport investment under the PONORI system, and we always will, provided that it appears to be viable and is within what the public sector can afford. It is not an area where there have been complaints of the Government holding back consents.

Amendment No. 14 would also enable controlling authorities to incur capital expenditure in connection with airport companies not set up under clause 12 without that expenditure counting against their capital expenditure allocations. As such, it represents a widening of the scope of an amendment that the hon. Member for West Bromwich, East moved in Committee to enable companies to borrow from the private sector for capital expenditure associated with the setting up of the company without that expenditure counting against allocations. It was withdrawn because the hon. Gentleman recognised its narrowness and failed to give any examples of such capital expenditure. He has made it wider this time, but I see no reason why, if an authority chooses to incur capital expenditure in connection with an airport company, it should receive special treatment.

We have already made a concession to enable the internally generated funds of airport companies to be reinvested outwith the controls. The amendment would go further and abolish those capital controls. That would be going too far, and I cannot advise the House to accept the hon. Gentleman's amendment.

Amendment negatived.

Clause 27

DIRECTIONS TO AIRPORT OPERATORS IN THE INTERESTS OF NATIONAL SECURITY ETC.

Mr. Steen: I beg to move, amendment No. 21, in page 19, line 36, leave out from 'security' to end of line 38.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): With this it will be convenient to consider the following: Government amendment No. 22.

Amendment No. 23, in page 20, line 2, leave out 'copy' and insert 'draft'.

Amendment No. 24, in page 20, line 2, after 'direction', insert 'proposed to be'.

Amendment No. 25, in page 20, line 30, at end add—

'(8) A direction under this section shall not be given unless a draft of the direction has been approved by a resolution of each House of Parliament.'.

Mr. Steen: At this time of night I am sure that most hon. Members would like me to make a short but pithy speech on the remaining amendments in my name and in the names of my hon. Friends. However, it would be less than appropriate at this time of night to skirt over important amendments that could affect the history of the aviation industry.

Amendment No. 21 would leave out the proposed power of the Secretary of State to give particular, as distinct from general, directions to an airport operator requiring him to do or not to do a specific thing or to discharge, or facilitate the discharge of, an international obligation of the United Kingdom. The amendment would leave untouched the proposed power for the Secretary of State to give general or particular directions to airport operators in the interests of national security under subsection (1) and (2).

The amendment seeks to limit the Secretary of State's enormous powers under clause 27. If one examines the whole of the Bill, it is evident that there is little that the Secretary of State cannot do in connection with airports or the aviation industry. He has enormous powers and the amendment seeks to ensure that, in connection with matters of national security, the Secretary of State has general and particular powers but where national security is not at issue, he should not have such enormously wide, unfettered powers.

If the Bill had been introduced by the Opposition, one would expect them to be seeking more centralised power for the Secretary of State. It is, therefore, not appropriate for Conservative Members to introduce a Bill that gives such enormous powers to a Secretary of State of this or a future Government. The amendment suggests that the Secretary of State's powers should be clipped and he should not have powers of a particular nature but of a general nature.

The provision that the amendment would remove probably serves no purpose, as the Secretary of State can achieve the same result under existing legislation. He has power under section 6 (2) of the Civil Aviation Act 1982 to give the Civil Aviation Authority a direction to insert in an aerodrome licence a condition that the holder will not perform specified actions in the interests of discharging the international obligations of the United Kingdom. Section 6 (2) of the Civil Aviation Act 1982 states:

"The Secretary of State may, after consultation with the CAA, give it directions to do a particular thing which it has power to do or refrain from doing a particular thing, if the Secretary of State considers it appropriate to give such directions."

It is difficult to know what the Government have in mind. They may be contemplating the abolition of aerodrome licences and perhaps that is what the Secretary of State is intending. Does he intend to do that and restrict matters of safety? [Interruption]. Mr. Deputy Speaker, I wonder whether you heard a noise in the Chamber? Perhaps it was simply my faulty hearing.

As I was saying before I was disturbed, I am not sure what the Government intend to do. The Minister must tell us why he is introducing a clause that gives the Secretary of State not only particular powers but general powers in relation to national security and all other matters. The purpose of the amendment is to tease out of the Government information on why they insist on such wide powers. If the Government's true purpose could be extracted from the Under-Secretary of State, the amendment could be treated as a probing amendment.

The related amendments to clause 27 require the Secretary of State to lay a draft of his proposed direction, whether it be general or specific, before each House of Parliament and to obtain approval for the draft by a resolution of each House. The requirement of an affirmative resolution would ensure that the direction could be debated in Parliament. The enthusiasm with which that suggestion has been greeted by my hon. Friends shows that they would wish for an affirmative resolution procedure to ensure that the House debated the matter properly.

I shall not detain the House any further on this complicated, technical point, which I see that my hon. Friends have grasped. There seems to be no point in the Secretary of State having those powers, except in cases of national security. However, national security is already enshrined in the 1982 Act. Why does the Secretary of State want those wide powers? What does he have in mind? I rest my case there.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Mr. James Couchman.

Mr. Nicholas Soames (Crawley): Briefly!

Mr. Couchman: I shall take note of the strictures of my hon. Friend the Member for Crawley (Mr. Soames) to be brief. I shall be much briefer than my hon. Friend the Member for South Hams (Mr. Steen).

The Secretary of State is taking considerable powers under clause 22, and Government amendment No. 22 takes him further down that road. The effect of amendment No. 22 is to put beyond doubt the fact that a direction to give effect to an international agreement would override the provision on economic regulation contained in part IV. That makes it even more imperative that the Secretary of State should take a discretionary power, written into statute, to pay compensation if such a direction meant that an airport would sustain a substantial loss.

Under part IV, a comprehensive regulatory structure will be created to control airline charges at the major airports. In making their investment decisions, investors will be substantially influenced by the terms of the permit, especially the terms relating to price. Once they have made their decision, they are at risk that the Government will enter into a new international agreement or obligation or reinterpret an existing obligation in a way that would lead to losses. That causes considerable concern to those who might invest in airports. Such a direction could undermine a regulatory regime and lead to significant losses for investors.

I draw the attention of my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State to that matter and ask him whether he believes that there should be a discretionary power—no more than that—to pay compensation if such a direction led to such losses.

Mr. Michael Spicer: I am advised that amendment No. 21 would seriously impair the Government's ability to meet their international obligations. A direction to the CAA under section 6 of the 1982 Act might allow the Secretary of State to include a condition in a licence in connection with an international obligation, but I am advised that we could not force the airport operator to comply. We feel that the subsection dealing with international obligations that my hon. Friend the Member for South Hams (Mr. Steen) would wish to delete is important. We have little doubt that failure to meet a treaty obligation could result in reciprocal action being taken against United Kingdom interests in the international forum. I am sure that that is not what my hon. Friend intends. I hope, therefore, that he will not press the amendment.

My hon. Friend the Member for Gillingham (Mr. Couchman) asked whether there would be any compensation arrangements following a direction. We discussed this matter in Committee. We would not envisage any compensation arrangements being made. The owners of international airports benefit considerably from the internationalism of their airports. That is one of the factors that will have to be taken into account, certainly in the prospectus, when BAA airports are sold.

Amendment No. 22 is purely technical. I believe that it answers the second of the issues raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Gillingham. Clause 27(2)(b) overrides the terms of part IV, which puts in place a system of economic regulation of airports which have a turnover of more than £1 million a year. It provides for the CAA to administer that system. It has always been our intention that paragraph (b) should override part IV. The amendment, which is purely technical, is designed to make that clear.

My hon. Friend the Member for South Hams mentioned amendments Nos. 23, 24 and 25. He would wish to introduce the affirmative resolution procedure in cases where the Secretary of State considers it necessary to use the powers of direction. We consider that that would be inappropriate, and, in certain limited circumstances involving national security, positively dangerous. If in the long summer recess an emergency arose — such circumstances would be limited — and it became necessary to issue directions for reasons of national security, it might be necessary to act very quickly. Therefore, we feel that it would be inappropriate to require the affirmative resolution procedure to be employed.

Mr. Steen: I think that my hon. Friend may have been briefed wrongly on this issue. It would be possible to act under the Civil Aviation Act 1982 if national security were involved. I am concerned about circumstances in which issues other than national security are involved. Particular and general directions should be brought to the House so that they can be debated. I wish to restrict the power of the Secretary of State to do whatever he likes without submitting the matter to the House, other than when national security is involved.

Mr. Spicer: My hon. Friend makes his point, but I am advised that the effect of the amendment would be as I have described. On that basis, I hope that he will not pursue his amendment and that the House will accept Government amendment No. 22.

Amendment negatived.

Amendment made: No. 22, in page 19, line 43, at end insert

Clause 28

TRAFFIC DISTRIBUTION RULES

1.15 am

Mr. Steen: I beg to move amendment No. 26, in page 20, line 35, leave out 'appropriate' and insert 'necessary'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take the following amendments:

No. 27, in page 20, line 35, at end insert

'in order to satisfy the demand in the near future for the use of one or more of those airports, having regard to the efficiency, economy and safety of civil aviation.'.

Government amendment No. 28.

No. 76, in page 20, line 39, at end insert

'taking into account the advice provided by the CAA'.

Government amendment No. 29.

No. 30, in page 21, line 2, leave out paragraph (a).

No. 31, in page 21, line 6, leave out from 'traffic' to the end of line 7 and insert

'to, from or within countries or territories specified in the rules, but shall not discriminate among aircraft or operators of aircraft, or among classes of aircraft or of operators of aircraft.'.

Government amendment No. 32.

No. 47, in clause 30, page 23, line 41, leave out paragraphs (b) and (c) and insert—

'(4A) A scheme under this section shall not discriminate among aircraft or operators of aircraft or among classes of aircraft or of operators of aircraft.'.

Mr. Steen: It is unfortunate that these important amendments to critical clauses should be debated at 1.15 am. I am delighted to see so many of my hon. Friends here, but it is regrettable that there are present only two Labour Members and no members of the Liberal and Social Democratic parties. Debate on these critical clauses occupied a great deal of time in Standing Committee.

Amendments Nos. 26 and 27 relate to clause 28. They propose to reduce the powers of the Secretary of State. The Bill gives the Secretary of State enormous powers to do any number of things in relation to airports and the aviation industry. These amendments, taken together, are directed to avoiding the making of unnecessary traffic distribution rules. Under the Bill, as it stands, the Secretary of State can make rules whenever he considers it appropriate to do so. That gives him total discretion without having to find any criteria for the exercise. I do not know whether my hon. Friends realise how enormous his powers are. In theory, if the clause goes through unamended, he will be able to move any airline from any airport in any part of Britain. He can direct that an airline route should be changed. He can direct that an airline should move to any airport and do anything he chooses. It may be said that the Minister would never do such a thing. However, that is what he would have power to do if the amendments are not approved.

The amendments require my right hon. Friend to satisfy himself that the proposed rules are necessary for meeting the demand for facilities at one or more of the airports serving the same area of the United Kingdom when the airport is, or is likely to be, overloaded beyond capacity. In satisfying himself, the Secretary of State will be required to have regard to the efficiency, economy and safety of civil aviation, which includes the needs of air traffic control.

The amendment seeks to provide some objective criteria which the Secretary of State would have to consider before he exercised his enormous powers. I think that the Secretary of State will agree that they are sensible criteria of efficiency, economy and safety, whereas at the moment there is no limitation on his powers.

The airline industry as a whole—that is, most of our British carriers—is very troubled about what clause 28 could enable the Secretary of State to do. The amendment, as drafted, would stop him moving airlines around without any reason for doing so. It provides that if there is still room at an airport he cannot move them. He would be able to move them only when more than one airport in the same area was overloaded.

Perhaps in that context one should deal with some of the smaller independent airlines—not just the scheduled airlines, but charter airlines. I should declare that I am advising one of the small charter airlines, British Island Airways, which is concerned about the possibility of being moved, lock, stock and barrel, out of Gatwick. The airline says that there is nothing to stop that now that CAP 517 has been produced. It is remarkable that it was produced just before the Report stage. It gives an insight into what the Civil Aviation Authority has in mind.

The CAA has in mind some schedule airlines, including the Brymon service from Plymouth to Heathrow. Part of the runway is in my constituency—it depends which way one lands and what the wind is like. Part of the airport at Plymouth abuts on my constituency. The Brymon flight from Plymouth, and Newquay to Heathrow would be affected. The CAA is clearly on the move, and the Minister needs the powers to move airlines from Heathrow to Gatwick. Once he does that, he will displace airlines from Gatwick, and they will come to Stansted.

I mentioned British Island Airways because it is the fifth largest carrier into Gatwick. It had the great privilege of flying the Prime Minister at the general election. It is one of the great success stories. It, along with other charter airlines, fears that it will be moved into Stansted. Clause 28 would give the Secretary of State just the powers that he needs. It allows him to do the very things that he needs to do—to allow CAP 517 to take effect.

Clause 28 gives the Minister great powers. Amendments Nos. 30 and 31 would restrict his power, in making traffic distribution rules, to discriminate between different classes of air traffic, by limiting that to discrimination between the destinations to which the aircraft may fly from the airport to which the rules apply. But the discrimination must be on a country by country basis—for example, all destinations in Spain, Scotland or the United Kingdom, or any other country or territory specified in the rules. The Secretary of State would no longer be able to discriminate between one airline and another, as he could under the Bill.

[Mr. Steen]

It is a pity that this is not realised. In theory, under clause 28, without amendment, the Minister could direct any aeroplane to go anywhere, whereas under the amendment he must discriminate fairly, on a country by country basis. For example, he could say that all 'planes flying to Spain out of Heathrow would be moved to Gatwick. He could not simply say that Iberia should be moved to Gatwick. Similarly, he could not move British Midland from Heathrow to Glasgow; he would have to move the British Airways shuttle as well. He could not discriminate against one airline, as CAP 517 has done, by moving the Dundee service. He could not do that if the amendment was carried.

Under the Bill as drafted, the Secretary of State can do anything he wishes. He need have no regard to different types of aircraft.He need have no regard to whether the aircraft are on scheduled or non-scheduled flights, public transport or private flights. There is a feeling in the airline industry that here again the Minister has enormous powers. In fact, he could run the whole aviation industry. He could direct everybody to do whatever he felt like doing. Of course, the present Secretary of State may not wish to do that, but he is taking reserve powers for the future. Many hon. Members believe that my right hon. Friend is giving to himself powers which are not needed. He must justify to the House why he needs such enormous reserve powers.

The Secretary of State can give directions that any aircraft should fly from anywhere to anywhere or move anywhere. Under the amendments my right hon. Friend must have regard to various factors. For example, he may say that all domestic feeder services must move from one airport to another. He may invent a class of aircraft and say that they must move. He may say that airlines with names beginning with the letter B should be moved or that captains who do not have yellow parrots on their shoulders when they take off should be moved. There are no limitations on the powers of the Secretary of State.

Apart from the Bill there are existing powers for the Secretary of State to regulate these matters, but only on a case to case basis. With regard to foreign aircraft my right hon. Friend can achieve the same result by refusing or imposing conditions upon the permit which is required by such aircraft to entitle them to carry passengers or cargo abroad, to or from the United Kingdom. The rule-making powers on British aircraft would be circumvented, to some degree, through existing air transport licensing procedures, which confer on aircraft operators the right to a hearing by the CAA and the right of appeal to the Secretary of State.

We are trying to provide an objective test in these amendments. As the Bill stands, there is no objective test. Clauses 28, 29 and 30 give the Secretary of State such power that he could distort the market forces of the airline industry and the airports. That could have a debilitating and devastating effect upon the course of the airline industry.

Mr. Bill Walker: My hon. Friend the Member for South Hams (Mr. Steen) has clearly spelt out the concern that is felt on the Conservative Benches with regard to the powers in clause 28. I wish to make my own position clear.

I favour a situation where the Secretary of State is the final arbiter. It is his responsibility to resolve matters. I have always felt that it should be Parliament's right to get at any Secretary of State. That is what lay behind my amendments relating to air navigation orders and other matters of that nature.

In the previous debate the Minister gave the usual Front Bench reaction to the House being given the opportunity to pray against orders. That is the great failing today. Too often we bring in legislation which effectively goes through on the nod, and the House cannot do anything about it. That is where the weakness lies in the powers that the Government are taking. Parliament is no longer able to act as a check and balance. That is the true function of Parliament. It is the means by which the electorate can get at Ministers and get things done or changed.

Amendment No. 26, to leave out "appropriate" and insert "necessary", is sensible. One ought not to have things which are considered to be appropriate. That is not good enough. What does it mean? When something is necessary, it is clear that there is no alternative and that something must be done.

1.30 am

It is important that the advice of the CAA should be heeded. I say that knowing full well that the CAA has put out a consultative document which effectively would remove Dundee flights from entry into Heathrow airport. I have explained to the people running that airline that it was not the intention of that document to bring that into being immediately, if ever. I underline that because it may never happen.

I have faith in the democratic parliamentary system. Where it is allowed to operate, it provides the necessary checks and balances. The important and missing ingredient is that which allows the House to pray against any decisions which are effectively fundamental to what is happening. It is fundamental to move any class of aircraft or carrier from one airport to another. One can imagine the situation in Scotland—although I realise that the problem will probably arise in the London network initially — and the difficulty one would have of explaining it to people in the east and west of Scotland. Anyone who understands the politics of Scotland will know that those regions are quite different. If an individual were faced with that it would be difficult. It is like making a choice between Hearts and Celtic or Hibernian and Rangers.

If the orders or any decisions affecting them were to come before the House in a manner in which the House could pray against them, that would make all the powers that are being requested so much more acceptable to Parliament, because at the end of the day that is what the public is looking for. The House of Commons should be able to reach Ministers and change things which the House believes is wrong.

Mr. Robert Hughes: I intervene simply to ask the hon. Gentleman what has brought about his blinding conversion to parliamentary control after what he said in Committee? I do not recall him voting in Committee for Opposition amendments which sought to secure precisely that all the various orders should be subject to parliamentary scrutiny.

Mr. Walker: The hon. Gentleman's memory is not good. I have all the records here. I ask the hon. Gentleman to look carefully at what I said in Committee, and indeed at what I have said about air navigation orders. The whole of the airline industry is affected by air navigation orders and the House has no means of praying against them. I have a six-and-a-half year record of speaking on that subject. I have had Adjournment debates and I have voted on more than one occasion. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will withdraw the suggestion that somehow I am changing course. I have been consistent from the beginning on how the House should deal with matters as fundamental as air navigation orders, which cover most of the areas where decisions are taken on the movement and positioning of aircraft and what can be done with aircraft. That is what is missing throughout the Bill, and it is missing from clause 28.

The amendments owe their origins to the fact not that the House is against the Secretary of State — any Secretary of State—making the final decisions, because it is right that he should be the final arbiter, but that the Secretary of State, whoever he is, should be accountable to Parliament.

Mr. Steen: That is the gist of all the amendments. The Bill gives the Secretary of State complete freedom and discretion with no criteria against which we can judge him. He can do whatever he likes. For the Government to give such powers to a centralised adminstration seems to conflict with their policies of decentralisation, deregulation and of laying down criteria to judge their performance. Does my hon. Friend agree that we are entirely behind the Bill and 100 per cent. in support of what the Minister is trying to do, but that we are not in favour of giving unfettered powers at the centre?

Mr. Walker: Yes. That sums up the mood on both the Opposition and the Government Benches. There is a recognition that if at sometime our airports should become completely clogged—if there were no scope to land more aircraft on the runways, nowhere to park on the tarmac, no access to gates and so on—and the system in operation could not resolve that situation, it would still have to be resolved. I understand that and believe that in the final analysis the Secretary of State is the right person to take decisions in such circumstances. I also believe, however, that no Secretary of State, regardless of his political colour, should be allowed to take such decisions without first referring to the House of Commons. I think that all Back Benchers would agree that we want to be the check and balance, so that there shall never be any suggestion that the decision has been a political rather than a proper democratic one.

Mr. Gerald Howarth: I support the amendment in the name of my hon. Friend the Member for South Hams (Mr. Steen), and I support what my hon. Friend the Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker) has said. The powers to be taken by the Secretary of State are very extensive. I think that they derive substantially from the principle behind the Bill, which I continue to find difficult to swallow. The London airports are beng proposed as a system and, consequently, extensive powers of traffic distribution are being taken. If each airport was able to appeal to the market, my right hon. Friend would not have to take these powers.

Under new clause 6 we discussed the question of the scheduling committees. These committees have very substantially resolved the problem of traffic distribution. They have made sure that the carriers have been able to satisfy their demands. As airports have begun to fill up that task has become more difficult, but each carrier is aware of the increasing risk that it will not get its desired slots, and decisions will have to be made about how best to cope with that situation when it arises. Various options are open to the carriers. These include the acceptance of sub-optimal timings, the rearrrangement of the historic and sup-optimal timings offered to achieve a satisfactory compromise, the acceptance of more optimal slots at an alternative airport and the use of greater capacity aircraft.

When faced with such problems, the carriers prefer to order their own destinies by making their own decisions. Government interference is resented. It is regarded as a paradox that the Government should be advocating the deregulation of air transport—and my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State is the most vigorous advocate in the Government of the deregulation of air transport—while at the same time, in order to facilitate deregulation, seeking to introduce a raft of new regulations which could be punitive for some carriers.

The Government argue that they need the powers principally because Heathrow and Gatwick are becoming saturated, but the fact is that, thanks to the activities of the scheduling committees, these airports are not yet saturated. If Heathrow, for example, were to become saturated, the owners of Heathrow plc might wish to consider seeking planning permission to build a STOL runway north of the airport, which could then handle the smaller aircraft, mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for South Hams. That might well happen if Heathrow plc were operated by a completely separate company from that operating Stansted. But of course that will not happen, because there will be no incentive for the operators of Heathrow plc to seek planning permission for a STOL runway to increase their capacity to meet increasing demand at that airport. They will happily be able to rely on the powers given to the Secretary of State by the Bill and he will direct the traffic to we know where—to Stansted.

I am sorry to detain my right hon. and hon. Friends at this late hour, but this clause is critical. It is central to the Government's case, and it is central to our case as to why the Government have not got the Bill as right as we would have wished. If the Government are in any doubt about why these amendments are necessary, they have only to look at what happened when they sought these powers, and used them, in respect of the Iberian operation. It was said at the time that Heathrow was already full. We all know that it was not full. The operators knew that it was not full, but the politicians said that it was full. What did they do? They said that all the Iberian routes would have to shift to Gatwick. Naturally, Iberia said, "Stuff that," or words to that effect in Spanish, "we are not going to have any of that." It is late, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and I think that one is entitled to use slightly freer language than one might at a normal hour of the day. The Spanish refused to wear that.

My right hon. Friend and his colleagues will be faced with endless rows with foreign carriers over where the traffic is to go. If these matters were left to the market, as they properly should be, and if each individual airport could plan for itself, could use every ounce of ingenuity to expand capacity rather than rely on the intervention of politicians, things would be a lot better.

I feel very strongly about this and I should like to go on for longer, but I do not want to keep my hon. Friends from their beds. I believe these powers to be draconian. In hands less sure than those of my right hon. Friend they could be used to do great damage to the British civil aviation industry. The amendments at least protect the industry from an over-zealous future Secretary of State.

Mr. Michael Spicer: I have to tell my hon. Friend the Member for Cannock and Burntwood (Mr. Howarth) that it is not bedtime yet. We have a lot more to do.

Could I say, particularly to my hon. Friend the Member for South Hams (Mr. Steen), that we recognise that some concern was expressed both in Committee and on its margins about this clause? It may be partly the fault of the drafting that the clause is unclear. I think that I heard my hon. Friend correctly when he said that under the powers of this clause the Secretary of State could move an airline to any airport — or words to that effect. That is manifestly not the case. Or, at least, it may not be manifestly not the case, but it is certainly not the intention. That is why one of the best ways of addressing the problem will be to discuss Government amendments aimed at remedying this lack of clarity, and I will come to them in a moment.

When my hon. Friend the Member for South Hams and I were looking at this clause together on an earlier occasion, he pointed out that under 28(1)(b), lines 35-38, the key words appeared to be "distributed between those airports". That matter concerned him and other colleagues in Committee. It was argued, fairly, that because of the way the clause was written the powers could be interpreted as being wide. The relevant part of the clause is subsection (3) which says:

"Traffic distribution rules may—

(a) specify classes or descriptions of air traffic that are permitted under the rules to use any of the airports concerned;

(b) impose prohibitions or restrictions in relation to the use of any of those airports by air traffic of any class or description specified in the rules."

We accept that there may have been a lack of clarity in the drafting.

1.45 am

Mr. Robert Hughes: I do not think there is any lack of clarity in the drafting of the clause. Subsection (1) says that the Secretary of State

"may make rules (to be known as traffic distribution rules) providing for air traffic, or any class or description of air traffic, to be distributed between those airports in such manner as he thinks fit."

That is absolutely clear. There is no doubt about it. There are no qualifications. Whatever else the clause may say, everything is governed by the fact that the Secretary of State may make regulations as he thinks fit. I welcome those words which I shall find useful as a future Secretary of State.

Mr. Spicer: The hon. Gentleman may be disappointed. I was about to say that we intend to clip his wings, but in this context he will never have any wings. If by a ghastly mischance he crossed the Floor of the House and, in recognition of that, became Secretary of State for Transport he would not have such power if the House accepts amendments Nos. 28, 29 and 32. They will make it clear that an airport operator cannot be forced to use a particular airport.

Amendments Nos. 28 and 29 make it clear that limitations will be placed on traffic distribution rules. Subsection (3) is already clear on that but we are tying it up. A traffic distribution rule can do any one of three things: it can permit the use of an airport; it can prohibit the use of an airport; and it can restrict the use of an airport. A traffic distribution rule cannot force any aircraft operator to use a particular airport against his will, so it cannot direct an operator to a particular airport.

Mr. Steen: Although the discussion is taking place at 1.48 am on Thursday, this is a critical matter. It is important that we understand exactly the impact of the Government amendments. As things stand, the Secretary of State can cause an airline, whether its services are scheduled or non-scheduled, and whether it is public or private, to go somewhere. He is now saying that as a result of the Government amendments, he cannot tell it to go somewhere but that it can go anywhere else. Many of us do not think that Heathrow will ever become full, but let us suppose that that happens within the next five years. In that event what is my hon. Friend saying that the Secretary of State can or will do?

What these amendments try to do is help him by giving him some criteria by which he can discriminate between one airline and another, but saying that he has to do it in destinations. What does he think will happen when Heathrow or Gatwick is full? Will he say that a certain airline flying into Heathrow—and a very good one—cannot fly there any more?

Mr. Spicer: My hon. Friend asks me to tell him what our distribution rules, if any, will be. I am not in a positiion to do that because we have not yet gone through the full procedure, as he knows. The CAA is currently discussing the recommendations that have come out and having further consultations. What I can tell him about —or remind him of, since he is very knowledgeable in this connection—are the policy objectives we have set for CAA in the work that it is undertaking, the results of which it will produce to the Secretary of State. As my hon. Friend says, these are important amendments and I very much hope that the Government amendments will respond to the broad thrust of what he is trying to achieve.

Our policy objectives are these. First, to make efficient use of existing and planned airport facilities and available air space; secondly to enable air services to be operated where they best meet the needs of the travelling public; thirdly, to support the objective of increasing competition between airlines in the interests of the users; fourthly, to ensure satisfactory access to Heathrow and Gatwick for domestic services—and we debated that issue at some length earlier; fifthly, to maintain London's position as a major international centre and, within that, to maintain Heathrow as London's main scheduled service airport, while continuing to develop Gatwick as an effective second hub; and, most important in terms of the debates that have taken place and the objectives of many of my hon. Friends, sixthly, to avoid undue dislocation of the airlines using London's airports.

That is a comprehensive list, and the CAA, of course, has pointed out that it is a very difficult one to live with, because it is wide-ranging and very specific. It perhaps answers my hon. Friend's question about the Government's policies and intentions with regard to traffic distribution rules. What I cannot tell him at this moment, for the reasons I have given, is the precise nature of those rules. I can tell him that the Government will take a minimalist approach—if that is the right word. We shall try to develop the system from where it is today as sensibly and gradually as possible. We realise of course that there is much debate to come as to when airports reach capacity, but I am sure my hon. Friend will not want to go over that again at this time of night.

Perhaps I ought to say to my hon. Friend the Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker) that I have not really discussed the question of parliamentary scrutiny and there are no amendments tabled on that, but he makes his point——

Mr. Bill Walker: There were amendments down but they were not selected.

Mr. Spicer: I was working from the amendments that have been selected, but perhaps that is not the way that I should have been doing it.

On the basis of the Government amendments, which I would recommend to the House, and of the objectives that I have given to the House, I hope that we have cleared up the quite understandable misconception that has existed about this clause and that we have satisfied my hon. Friends to the point that they will be able to withdraw their amendments.

Amendment negatived.

Amendments made: No. 28, in clause 28, page 20, line 36, after 'may' insert 'in accordance with this section'.

No. 29, in page 21, line 1, at end insert

Clause 29

POWER TO LIMIT AIRCRAFT MOVEMENTS IN CERTAIN AIRPORTS

Mr. Michael Spicer: I beg to move amendment No. 33, in page 21, line 37, leave out from 'applies' to ', make' in line 40.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take Government amendment No. 35.

Mr. Spicer: The Standing Committee decision to accept amendment No. 48 and take it into the body of clause 29 means that the ATM power we seek would be extremely difficult to exercise at any airport, including Stansted. Hon. Members did not appreciate the main thrust of what was involved. What amendment No. 48 did was restrict the operation of ATM limits to that class of airport at which a limit would, in the judgment of the Secretary of State, following consultation with the CAA, result in a significant and perceptible control of aircraft noise nuisance which would be noticed by people living near the airport.

This test would be unlikely to be made at Stansted, at least for the time being, while current usage at the airport is well below the proposed limit. The purpose of the ATM limit is to facilitate the controlled expansion at a developing airport in such a way as to avoid the local infrastructure becoming overused. Certainly it enables Parliament to take a view about that development. Amendment No. 48, which was carried by the Committee, provided for exactly the opposite. In other words, it provided for the uncontrolled expansion of an airport, irrespective of any local impact. Thus, amendment No. 33 is designed to reverse amendment No. 48, and to restore the effectiveness of the clause so that an ATM can be set where appropriate. There has been some confusion in Committee about this situation, and I hope that amendment No. 33 will therefore be accepted.

I now turn to amendment No. 35. The Committee had before it amendment No. 49, which aimed to target the ATM limit powers specifically at those developing areas that had terminal expansion in progress. Hon. Members would have had certain thoughts in mind when they took a view about that amendment. We have some sympathy with the intentions that lay behind the amendment. My hon. Friend the Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker) clearly had in mind the restriction of clause 29 to those airports where there was the general prospect of development, to the exclusion of those airports already fully utilised, if not congested. I commend amendment No. 35 to the House. It is designed to achieve much the same result as the amendment No. 49 which appeared before the Committee. Amendment No. 35 restricts the application of clause 29 to airports at which the capacity of the existing runway or runways is not fully used for a substantial proportion of the operating day. The power to set an ATM limit will be restricted only to the airports where there is a genuine prospect of development because runway capacity is underused.

Amendments Nos. 36 and 42 would do much the same, but our draftsmen think that amendment No. 35 is the more appropriate method.

2 am

Mr. Bill Walker: I welcome the amendments. They are a big improvement on my amendment which the Committee accepted.

Mr. Steen: The amendments are a step in the right direction, but the Secretary of State still has enormous powers. Amendment No. 35 speaks of runway capacity that is not fully utilised for a "substantial proportion" of time. Does not the House recall the complications in Committee about this? What is a "substantial proportion" of time? Will there be endless appeals to the Secretary of State. Will not the present arrangements break down?

The Secretary of State will be involved in many decisions. Has he considered the manpower implications? How many extra officials will he need to administer the Bill? More and more airlines are to be allowed to ask him for his intervention. Has he estimated how many extra staff will be needed? The Bill gives him ever greater powers in the running of airports, air transport movements and where airlines fly to and from. Can my hon. Friend give some idea of the number of staff who will be required to deal with these matters?

Mr. Michael Spicer: No, because we do not envisage many airports being involved.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment made: No. 35, in page 22, line 5, leave out from 'to' to end of line 8 and insert

'an airport if it appears to the Secretary of State that the existing runway capacity of the airport is not fully utilised for a substantial proportion of the time during which its runway or runways is or are available for the take-off or landing of aircraft'.—[Mr. Archie Hamilton.]

Mr. Steen: I beg to move amendment No. 37, in page 22, line 40, leave out 'such of'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss the following:

Government amendments Nos. 38 and 39.

Government amendment No. 81.

Mr. Steen: Towards the end of a marathon, one tends to repeat oneself. I hope that I shall be guilty not of tedious repetition, but of just a little repetition.

Amendments Nos. 37 and 41 relate to the power of the Secretary of State in clause 29 to make an order to limit the movements of aircraft at certain airports.

All the amendments deal with the powers of the Secretary of State. Clause 29 specifically deals with his powers to limit movements. The House has heard an outcry from my hon. Friends who believe that the Secretary of State has draconian powers. His powers are so enormous, wide and ill-defined and give him such discretion that they allow him to do anything, anywhere at any time. There are almost no criteria whereby we can judge what he will or will not do. The amendments seek to limit those powers. Amendment No. 41 does that in a specific manner and the other amendments do it in other ways.

Amendment No. 41 requires the Secretary of State to consult operators of aircraft which appear to be likely to be affected by the order as well as the organisations representing operators of aircraft. The Secretary of State would no longer have the discretion that he has under the Bill not to consult operators and organisations of operators on the ground that he did not think it appropriate to consult them. There is no limit to what the Secretary of State can do, and the amendment seeks to provide some criteria for what he should do.

The Secretary of State should consult operators. At present there is no obligation or onus in the Bill on him to do anything at all. This is the cri de coeur that has been heard from Conservative Benches and I hope that in the years to come it will not be so inappropriate that the Government should proceed to give the Secretary of State more powers over the movement of aircraft and the aircraft industry.

Will my right hon. Friend tell us why he will not accept this amendment under which he would at least consult the operators of aircraft? At present there is no reason why he should consult the operators. He should give an undertaking to the House that he will consult operators of aircraft who appear to be likely to be affected. If he is preparing all these sections of the Bill for a situation which will never exist, why is he doing this now? Why does he not wait five or 10 years until the situation arises?

Mr. Ancram: I believe that my hon. Friend the Member for South Hams (Mr. Steen) is still labouring under the effects of the previous amendments, and I am sorry that he did not recognise that within the grouping of these amendments there are Government amendments which respond to proposals which were made in Committee. My hon. Friend the Member for Saffron Walden (Mr. Haselhurst) moved an amendment in Standing Committee which sought to add local authority interests to the list of organisations which must be consulted before an ATM limit order is made. The Government accepted the principle which underlay that amendment and undertook to return to the matter on Report with appropriately drafted amendments. Amendments Nos. 38, 39 and 81 fulfil that commitment.

We see the use of an ATM limit very much as an instrument for controlling the expansion of use of a developing airport. Part of the function of an ATM limit will be to ensure that the increasing use of an airport does not overstretch the capacity of local infrastructure, the planning responsibility for which falls to local authorities. It therefore makes good sense to provide for consultation with local planning authorities which are likely to be affected by operations at the airport on the particular issues raised by the application of an ATM limit.

I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for South Hams will agree that the Government amendments achieve the objectives which my hon. Friend the Member for Saffron Walden mentioned in Committee. My hon. Friend seems to think that there will be no consultation. I stress that the local authorities affected will be included in the consultation procedure that is provided for in clause 29(6).

If the Government amendments are accepted, as I hope they will be, clause 29 will provide for obligatory consultation with the CAA and the airport operator affected, and for discretionary consultation with a variety of aircraft operator interests, including those operators who seem likely to be affected and appropriate organisations representing operators of aircraft. Of course, local authorities would come in that category.

My hon. Friend's amendments seek to create a much more rigid consultation procedure than clause 29 envisages. They would compel consultation, not only with the CAA and the aircraft operator affected, but with operators of aircraft who are likely to be affected and organisations representing operators of aircraft. That would severely restrict the latitude which the Government would have in selecting, for instance, the aircraft operator organisations that should be consulted. There must be some latitude. Some aircraft operator organisations would, inevitably, be closely interested; by the same token, other organisations might have no interest in some cases. But the amendments would compel consultation regardless of whether those organisations had an interest in the matter. Earlier, my hon. Friend expressed concern about the burdens on staff in the Department of Transport, but his amendments would be burdensome, costly and wasteful.

Those are the reasons why I cannot accept my hon. Friend's amendments. I hope that he appreciates the Government's genuine intention to consult. As my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State said earlier, many clauses would require the Government to seek an affirmative resolution of both Houses of Parliament, so hon. Members would have a chance to declare their interests in the matter. I hope that the Government amendments will be accepted, and I ask my hon. Friend to withdraw his amendment.

Sir Humphrey Atkins (Spelthorne): The speech of my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Scotland showed that, although the Government will be obliged to consult several people and bodies, they will not be obliged to consult the local authorities. Why should that be at the Secretary of State's discretion? I understand my hon. Friend's arguments so far, but why does he wish to relieve the Government of the obligation to consult the local authorities, which are closely involved in such matters and wish to be consulted? The Government amendments would give the Secretary of State discretion to consult the local authorities. Would it not be better if he was obliged to do so?

Mr. Ancram: There must be an element of discretion in this area, because my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State should consult only local authorities that are likely to be affected. The extent to which they are likely to be affected should also be taken into account. The Government amendments, which respond to an amendment tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Saffron Walden, will mean that the local authorities which are likely to be affected are likely to be consulted. But if the Secretary of State was obliged to consult all local authorities, whether or not they had an interest in the matter, we should create unnecessary burdens and problems.

Clause 29(6)(a) contains a similar provision, in that operators of aircraft who appear to the Secretary of State to be likely to be affected may also be consulted. There is a double discretion because of the precise nature of the consultations and the interests of those organisations which must be taken into account. That is the pattern that we have followed, and I believe that we have fulfilled the undertakings that we gave in Committee.

Mr. Steen: With the leave of the House, may I ask the Minister to help hon. Members in this respect: does he believe that it is most unlikely that the powers contained in clause 29 will be used in the near future? If he can give an undertaking to that effect, of course, I shall seek to withdraw the amendment.

Mr. Ancram: In view of what my hon. Friend said in the debate on the previous set of amendments, I cannot give such an undertaking. But it would be unthinkable not to consult the organisations involved. I hope that that satisfies my hon. Friend's main points and that he will withdraw his amendment.

Amendment negatived.

Amendments made: No. 38, in page 22, line 42, leave out 'and'.

No. 39, in page 22, line 43, at end insert

'and

(c) any local authority or authorities who appear to the Secretary of State to be affected by operations at the airport,'.

No. 81, in page 23, line 1, leave out subsection (7) and insert—

'(7) In subsection (6) "local authority"—

(a) in relation to England, Wales and Scotland, has the meaning given by section 11(1);

(b) in relation to Northern Ireland, means a district council established under the Local Government Act (Northern Ireland) 1972.'.—[Mr. Ridley.]

Clause 30

SCHEMES FOR ALLOCATING CAPACITY AT AIRPORTS

2.15 am

Mr. Steen: I beg to move amendment No. 51, in page 24, line 20, at end insert—

'(7A) Compliance with the relevant provisions of the scheme shall be a condition of every licence granted under section 65 of the 1982 Act, and of every permission granted under an Air Navigation Order for aircraft registered in a country other than the United Kingdom to take up and set down passengers or cargo in the United Kingdom'.

The amendment would insert a new subsection to give teeth to the scheme that is provided for in clause 30 by making compliance with the scheme a statutory condition of the licences or permits required respectively by United Kingdom, foreign or Commonwealth aircraft for carriage for reward to or from the United Kingdom. Non-compliance would become an offence punishable under existing law by a fine of £1,000 upon summary conviction and restrainable by injunction. Otherwise enforcement of the scheme would be left to the proprietor of the airport as owner of the land.

I think that there is a deficiency in the Bill, and I hope that the amendment will go some way to putting it right.

Mr. Bill Walker: I wish to draw the attention of the Chair to the fact that the amendment causes us to discuss air navigation orders. I was informed that amendment No. 69, which I tabled, could not be included in the selection list because of a technical drafting defect — in other words, it referred to air navigation orders. We have done little else but refer to air navigation orders for most of the evening, and the House has not had the opportunity to debate one of the most important principles of all, which is whether hon. Members should have the right to pray against an air navigation order. The House has not been given the opportunity to do that throughout its consideration of the Bill on the Floor of the House and in Committee. It has been deprived of an opportunity to deal with a fundamental——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman must not refer to an amendment that has not been selected. He must not criticise Mr. Speaker's selection.

Mr. Walker: I understand that, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I am sure that you will understand that when the Bill goes to another place their Lordships will read carefully what has been said in this place. I am sure that the point I have made will not be missed by them.

Mr. Ancram: I know that my hon. Friend the Member for South Hams (Mr. Steen) was seeking to be helpful in introducing the amendment and I am sorry that I shall have to ask him to withdraw it, which I have had to ask him to do in respect of other amendments.

I ask my hon. Friend to withdraw the amendment because compliance with slot allocation schemes is already vested under clause 30 in the airport operator. Subsection (7) sets out that where a scheme under clause 30 is in force

"it shall be the duty of the airport operator to give effect to the scheme."

At an airport that is subject to a slot allocation scheme an aircraft operator will need the necessary air transport licence or an operating permit and he will need a slot. The amendment, which tries to combine these requirements, would cause confusion.

The amendment is unnecessary, and I ask my hon. Friend to withdraw it.

Amendment negatived.

INTERPRETATION OF PART IV

Mr. Bill Walker: I beg to move amendment No. 54, in page 26, line 3, at end insert

'"the airport operator" means either the sole provider of airport facilities for which airport charges may be levied under this Part, or the several providers of such facilities at such airports.'.

The amendment was linked to new clause 9, which we debated much earlier. As I was encouraged by what my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said at the end of the debate on new clause 9, when he indicated that he would be keen to see some other involvement other than moneys being put into other operations at the airport, it may be necessary, if that were to happen, for an amendment of this sort to be incorporated in the Bill to cover the providers of such facilities, who need not be the principal airport operators in future. It could be beneficial for that provision to be incorporated in the Bill.

Mr. Ridley: As my hon. Friend says, the direct point of the amendment fell when new clause 9 was not included in the Bill. If under a voluntary agreement independent terminal operators come into existence, I accept that they may have to have some basis for charging. However, they would come into existence only under an agreed scheme with the airport operator. Presumably it would be possible under that arrangement for the allocation of charges, the method of charging or the type of charges to be agreed. I hope that my hon. Friend will agree that it would be inappropriate to press this amendment at present.

Mr. Michael Spicer: I beg to move amendment No. 55, in page 26, leave out lines 17 to 19.

Those hon. Members who were on the Standing Committee will remember that the line the amendment seeks to remove was successfully inserted by my hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington (Mr. Dicks). We feel that my hon. Friend's amendment is not the best way to extend more protection to concessionaires. I know that he now accepts, in turn, that we are disposed to accept that some further strengthening may be needed for concessionaires to ensure that, in particular, at five-yearly Monopolies and Mergers Commission reviews the MMC can take into account the legitimate interests of concessionaires as part of its consideration of where the public interest lies. For that purpose, we intend to put concessionaires on the same footing as users.

We have not been able to bring forward an amendment for Report, but the Government intend to bring forward a suitable amendment in another place, which I know pleases my hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington. I hope that, on the basis of what I have said, this amendment will be accepted.

Amendment agreed to.

Bill to be read the Third time this day.

Basildon Development Corporation

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Garel-Jones.]

2.22 am

Mr. David Amess (Basildon): The fact that I am able confidently to make the statement that Basildon is not only the most sucessful new town in the United Kingdom but the most dynamic is largely due to the success and endeavours of the development corporation. On 31 March the development corporation was wound up, having been in existence since the year when I was born. Its passing was a significant moment for my constituents and constituency. It marked the end of Basildon being described, in any real sense, as a new town—we have come of age. My hon. Friend the Minister will recognise that I judge that to have happened just a little too quickly. I very much wanted the life and work of the development corporation to be extended a little longer, so that it could complete a number of important tasks.

As for the role of the corporation in the development of the town, I sometimes wonder how widely the extent to which the Government have encouraged or invested money through that body is appreciated or understood. Vast sums have been spent wisely to make Basildon what it is today—the finest town in the United Kingdom. I pay tribute to all the staff of the development corporation, its general manager, Mr. Douglas Galloway, and above all the chairman, Dame Elizabeth Coker. Those people have all worked tirelessly in their efforts to create a town of which we can all be proud, and they have certainly succeeded in that aim.

I would not support everything that the corporation has done. For instance, I can well appreciate the resentment felt in some quarters at the manner in which it has compulsorily purchased land or properties, and indeed about the design of some of the housing estates. Nevertheless, credits should be given for the many successful initiatives that the corporation has undertaken. Its task of attracting new business to the area has been one of the main contributing factors to the reduction of unemployment in Basildon over the past year — a reduction of 5·8 per cent.

Thanks to the Government and the corporation, my constituency has grown in stature as a strategic centre for business and industry. That point has ably been seized by Essex county council, which will be holding a substantial business and industry exhibition in Basildon on 14 April. The M25, the expansion of Stansted and the building of the Channel tunnel will all enhance the attractiveness of the town for trade and industry, as can be testified by visits recently from Department of Trade and Industry Ministers.

Thanks to rate capping and the Government's proposals to set business rates centrally, the damaging effects of the Socialist councils' high rating policies have been successfully counteracted. The development corporation has given active support to many local organisations and charities. Two projects which I know are grateful for the support given are the centre recently opened in Vange for the visually handicapped, and St. Luke's hospice for cancer patients. Both facilities meet important needs in the community, but they might not have got off the ground if it had not been for the encouragement and assistance given by the development corporation.

[Mr. David Amess]

The jewel in the crown of the corporation must be the new shopping centre, the largest covered shopping centre in Europe, which I trust will enjoy an official opening later this year. There can be no rival facility in the United Kingdom to that of the East Gate mall in Basildon, which successfully heralds the concept of shopping in the 21st century. Merchandise of every conceivable description can be purchased within attractive and comfortable surroundings. This showpiece has given the ultimate dimension to the town's slogan, "Basildon means business."

The demise of the development corporation begs many questions in the minds of my constituents. They rightly ask: what next? They have been told that that which they have known for so long, the development corporation, has gone, and has been replaced by the Commission for the New Towns. They are anxious to know precisely what that means, particularly what the powers and responsibilities of the commission are. The 15,500 former corporation tenants are anxious to know what will happen to the management of their dwellings, whether programmes of repairs and improvements will continue, and whether there will be the same spirit of co-operation should they wish to purchase their property. It is well known that the Basildon development corporation was a pioneer in that area, achieving record sales. Further anxiety has been expressed that if agreement is eventually reached on the handing over of housing stock to the local authority, Socialist opposition — by which I mean the Labour party, the Social Democratic party and the Liberal party — might somehow frustrate people's plans to purchase their own property.

Constituents have asked what the future is for the tasks and projects started by the corporation, such as road systems, and whether it is the intention of the Commission for the New Towns to complete them. On Monday I had a meeting with the chairman of the commission and the chief executive, Sir Neil Shields and Mr. Woodhall. Because of our discussions, I am reassured that Basildon will go forward into a new and exciting future, and I trust that my hon. Friend the Minister will be able to confirm that when he replies to the debate.

There are specific anxieties which constituents have raised and which I wish to bring to the attention of the House. The first concerns a potentially serious problem which affects over 1,000 properties in the Vange area of Basildon.

I have been inundated with letters from the owners of Lindsay Parkinson High Speed System Build properties. There are approximately 600 houses and 200 flats. Over half of the properties have been purchased from the development corporation, but some from the local authority. As a result of people's homes developing defects and the difficulties they have encountered in trying to sell such properties, an action group has been formed. The problems with the properties are due to carbonation —porous concrete; spaling—the cracking and corrosion of concrete beams caused by rust in the metal strengthening rods; and calcium concrete, when calcium carbonate has been used as a drying agent in the construction of the beams.

Some of the letters I have received described cracks appearing in the properties. Others described the distressing cricumstances of being unable to sell and prospective purchasers pulling out at the last moment because of the difficulty of obtaining support from building societies.

The action group has asked for help in a number of respects. It strongly urges for a clean bill of health for all the sound properties. To achieve that, tests will have to be a carried out on all the dwellings. The action group wants the Commission for the New Towns to buy back the properties which cannot be sold at the full market price. The group feels that the commission should seek funds from the Government to carry out essential repairs. It feels that the commission should indemnify the owners against future defects in construction and should seek ways to extend the life of the properties through the use, for example, of mastic sealing on the defective points.

The builders have gone into liquidation. Some of my constituents make the point that there was an irresponsible use of the chemical compound, calcium chloride, by the contractors who manufactured the components. The local authority contractor neglectfully accepted the components without a quality assurance certificate. The corporation's site representative should have seen such documents.

My constituents enthusiastically purchased their properties, taking full advantage of the right-to-buy legislation. Now that the problems with these properties have emerged, I have every confidence that the commission and the Government will act quickly to assist my constituents. I shall not rest until these matters have been dealt with satisfactorily.

The commission should also try to resolve the problems which have been highlighted by the Felmores Heating Action Group. Four weeks ago that group met my hon. Friend the Minister for Housing, Urban Affairs and Construction in Basildon. The group, which represents a considerable number of tenants, maintains that the district heating system provided for the Felmores estate is inefficient and expensive. Nearly a thousand tenants are served by this system. Some are in stressful circumstances —unemployed or single parents.

I have toured the estate and talked to many of the residents. I have seen countless heating bills which seem to be consistently high, especially when one bears in mind the size of the dwellings. The estate was designed in 1974 and built by ABK, based on the findings of Ore Arun and Partners, prompted by the 1973 energy crisis. The company studied the cost effectiveness of various energy saving measures in yardstick housing. The coal-fired district heating system is run for the corporation by Associated Heating Services. It provides domestic hot water as well as space heating, and it is in operation all the year.

Tenants pay a small standing charge, together with an amount based on their estimated consumption. There is a weekly charge throughout the year, which is paid with the rent. The heat meters are read annually, and rebates or supplementary bills are given. Integral meters calculate the kilowatt hours consumed from the flow rate and the temperature difference between incoming and outgoing water. Thermostats with time switches can be used by tenants to regulate the system. A realistic assessment of running costs for the Felmores average house is considered to be £250 per annum using an individual low thermal content, wall mounted, balanced flue boiler with programmer control for domestic hot water and space heating and thermostatic radiator valves. The average charge levied for heating the average house on the Felmores estate with its district heating system is 56 per cent. higher than the cost of running an individually fitted gas boiler heating system in each dwelling.

I should add that similar problems are being experienced at the other end of Basildon in the Langdon Hills area. So I would ask that assistance be given immediately to relieve the distress of my constituents and that individual gas-fired central heating be provided. The case for that is overwhelming.

Recently, an action group has been formed of residents opposed to a bus link between the town centre through Ghyllgrove to Cranes Farm road and the industrial areas. I have received countles representations, both written and personnel, opposing the bus link. If the proposal were to go ahead there would be 26 buses per hour through the peak times. Residents feel that that would change a beautiful, safe, quiet residential area into a dangerous, noisy petrol or diesel-polluted highway. The bus link is also opposed by the governing body of the local school, Ghyllgrave, and by the Basildon industrial group. In fact, I am struggling to find anybody who supports the bus route. It is argued that there would be severe traffic congestion at the southern end of Ghyllgrove caused by buses as they give way to the main bus route in Whitmore Way. Particular concerns have been raised about increased dangers to schoolchildren, youngsters and pensioners crossing the roads. I very much hope that that project will not go ahead and that the alternative proposals of residents and the Basildon industrial group will be acted upon.

The final concern that I want to deal with tonight is that of residents in the Eversley area of Pitsea. They bought properties in a development promoted by the corporaion as a quiet residential area. One can well imagine their horror when they learnt of a proposal for a bus route to run right through the estate. Residents have been further alarmed by suggestions that the local Socialist authority intends further developments to surrounding areas. Those people ask only that they be left to enjoy the peace and tranquility which originally attracted them to that area.

The winding up of the developmet corporation and the arrival of the New Towns Commission is a critical moment for Basildon. There is a point in the life of a town when development has to stop. My constituents do not want the town to become over-developed and for the crowded conditions of London, from where many of them originally came, to be duplicated. I have every confidence that the New Towns Commission will act on my constituents' wishes to help improve the quality of life and respect our precious countryside.

2.39 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Richard Tracey): My hon. Friend the Member for Basildon (Mr. Amess) has been a strong advocate of Basildon new town and has always represented his constituents in a clear and forceful manner. Tonight has been no exception to the excellent service that he gives to his constituents. However, I am sure that my hon. Friend will be aware that a target date for the wind-up of the Basildon Development corporation has been publicly on the agenda since 1978, when a wind-up date of 31 December 1983 was announced. Since that time, wind-up has been postponed on two separate occasions, primarily to complete the land assembly programme and to achieve housing transfer, which was originally envisaged, as elsewhere, to the district council. I take on board what my hon. Friend said, and hope that he will listen to a few remarks about that. The land assembly programme has been a complex and difficult task, and one that Basildon has now completed. To appreciate the achievement, I should like to take the House back to the situation that led to Basildon's designation as a new town.

The main purpose in designating Basildon new town was to provide housing and jobs and to relieve the housing problems in the aftermath of the second world war. This was in line with other new towns around London. However, Basildon has a secondary and very special task to achieve, arising from the unusual local history. As my hon. Friend will know better than I, as far back as 1901, land at Basildon had been divided into small plots and sold to Londoners at what was known as 'champagne sales." This usually meant that the potential buyers' judgment had been impaired by the generous hospitality of the commercial company selling the land. This process continued until the second world war. The land was not of good farming quality, and many farmers sold of their holdings piecemeal, in competition with estate companies. Unfortunately, no thought was given to future development by the land speculators, and consequently no roads or sewers were ever constructed.

Development was sporadic, with many plots remaining as untouched as they were when first purchased. In addition, much of the building was of a temporary nature or of a very poor standard. When Basildon new town was designated in 1949, the corporation was given the task of buying up all these plots in order to sort out this difficult legacy. The corporation embarked on this task in 1951, which involved the purchase of some 30,000 plots of land, many in unknown ownership. Only recently has the corporation completed the acquisition of all outstanding interests required for future development—a task that nobody foresaw would take quite as long as it did. During the 35 years that it has taken to assemble all the necessary land, Basildon's population has risen from 25,000 to 100,000. The recent completion of 37 sheltered dwellings for the elderly, at Felmore, brought to an end the corporation's direct involvement in house building. This has resulted in the construction of 24,839 houses, bungalows and flats, of which 10,000 have been sold to tenants.

The market for private housing for sale has always been strong in Basildon, and the development corporation has played a significant role in ensuring that a wide range of housing is on offer—from one-bedroom flats to five-bedroom houses. The corporation has placed particular emphasis on the availability of housing for young, first-time buyers, and for the elderly through sheltered housing schemes. The corporation has also given a lead to developers in the private housing sector, promoting the provision of good quality housing at all price levels, with high environmental standards. By entering into partnership arrangements, the expertise of many years has been applied, whereby the private builder is now prepared to build a wider range of homes.

My hon. Friend referred to housing transfer. I referred earlier to the transfer of corporation housing to the council and to the fact that in the past wind-up had been delayed to facilitate this. The traditional practice when new towns are wound up has certainly been to transfer rented housing stock to the relevant district council. Indeed, this course has always been followed in England, except in the case of central Lancashire where the housing passed to four housing associations. But we do not want the district council option to be the only one considered in future, including at Basildon. My hon. Friend may have seen a written answer that I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for The Wrekin (Mr. Hawksley) just before Easter. I said that the Government are keen to see pursued the options of transfers to private sector trusts or housing associations. In this context, Thamesmead should be an incentive. The Commission for the New Towns, which has now taken responsibility for the development corporation's housing stock in Basildon, has the same powers as the corporation with regard to negotiating transfer arrangements, and I expect the commission to discuss with my officials how best to pursue the options. I am sure that my hon. Friend will find a ready ear in Sir Neil Shields, the chairman of the commission, in his future talks with him on this point.

The corporation's achievements at Basildon have not been limited to land assembly and housing provision. Some 850,000 sq m of factory space have been provided, along with 75,000 sq m of office space. This has resulted in the creation of new jobs in the office and service industry sectors. The corporation has played an important role in encouraging and assisting smaller starter firms. The institution funds, which have provided so much building capital in recent years, are often reluctant to accept starter firms as tenants, and the firms themselves often prefer to limit their outgoings on accommodation.

One way in which the corporation decided to meet these needs was by the conversion of an old vacant factory into small industrial units. This scheme, known as the Laindon enterprise centre, has been such a success that the remainder of the old factory has been converted to provide further units. Initiatives such as this have provided Basildon development corporation with a notable record for creating job opportunities.

The Commission for the New Towns has now inherited the task of continuing to promote the town and to attract investment, and it will see to completion the many schemes put in hand by the corporation and under construction, which will offer many more permanent jobs in the future.

My hon. Friend rightly mentioned that one of the most noticeable improvements in Basildon in recent years has been the changing face of the town centre. Retail and office developments, imaginative in design, have dominated the commercial scene in Basildon since the opening of a 15,000 sq m Savacentre store and associated shopping mall in 1980. This scheme, known as Phase 1, heralded a new era in the history of Basildon town centre. Phase 1 was designed, constructed and let by the development corporation, and it was the start of a process that planned to provide Basildon with the most advanced regional shopping centre complex in Essex.

Phase 2 commenced in 1981, in the Eastgate area of the town centre. This development, on a six-acre site, is right in the heart of the existing town centre, and was designed with flair and imagination to provide an airy and pleasant covered environment for shoppers. The development consists of a 19,000 sq m development store and 75 shop units. Two shopping levels have been linked to tiered galleries above, servicing four levels of car parking for approximately 1,000 vehicles. The whole scheme is one of the most advanced of its kind in the country, and certainly has no comparison in the south-east. It is an outstanding memorial to the enterprise and innovation shown by the development corporation during its lifetime.

Further proposals by the corporation, which have recently received planning approval, involve the roofing-in of those areas of the old town centre that lie between Phase 1 and Phase 2, and extending this cover beyond Phase 2 to the existing town square. This scheme is exciting in its concept, and if a way can be found to allow it to proceed, it should provide the necessary boost to the older areas of the town centre, in order that they can effectively compete with the surrounding high-quality, environmentally controlled new developments.

My hon. Friend has rightly mentioned several points which are bothering his constituents. Perhaps I can now deal specifically with those points. First, he mentioned the Felmore district heating scheme. I understand the points that he made about the adequacy of this district heating system. I can tell him that my officials are currently appraising the financial implications of improving the existing system against a total replacement programme. A decision on this will be made as soon as possible.

My hon. Friend then turned to the Ghyllgrove busway. That was one of the corporation's last planning applications under section 7(1) of the New Towns Act 1981. It was for the construction of a bus-only link between Cranes Farm road and Ghyllgrove, which was, I understand, to permit the rationalisation of bus routes serving the industrial areas in the northern area of Basildon.

The application came rather late and, as my hon. Friend said, it attracted unanimous opposition from local residents. Many of the points raised required further investigation by the Department, but, as there was insufficient time to pursue the matter before the corporation was wound up, it was not possible to approve the application under the appropriate section of the New Towns Act 1981. It will be open to the commission to reopen the application, but, before deciding whether to do so, I am sure the commission will consider the points that have been raised by my hon. Friend and his constituents.

I note what my hon. Friend said about the development at Eversley, and in particular the proposed bus route through the area. The points that he has made will be considered carefully and, where necessary, will be referred to my colleagues in the Department of Transport.

My hon. Friend referred to the Vange area housing. My officials are examining that closely. We hope to come back with conclusions as soon as possible. We may have some hope for my hon. Friend on that.

The success of Basildon owes much to the time and effort given by the chairman and general manager of the development corporation. They have been successful in completing much worthwhile development and in combining the needs of the town with the requirements of the individual inhabitants. This may be recognised as a classic pattern of action-centred leadership. The corporation has shown that a dynamic town such as Basildon can only be developed from within by being sensitive to representations, market forces and the wishes of the people. I am sure, therefore, that my hon. Friend will join me in thanking Dame Elizabeth Coker and Mr. Galloway, the manager of the corporation, for their hard work. My hon. Friend has already mentioned that. On behalf of the Government, I thank those two hard-working people for the work they have done.

The assets and liabilities of Basildon development corporation have now been transferred to the Commission for the New Towns. The commission has set up a local committee to manage Basildon's rented housing stock. I hope my hon. Friend has noted the points that I have made about housing.

I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving me the opportunity to put on record the appreciation of myself and the Government for all that the development corporation has achieved. Within the next three months, before the corporation is dissolved, I hope to visit Basildon and to convey those thanks to the good people of my hon. Friend's town.

Question put and agreed to.

Oral Answers to Questions

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Conservation

1. Mr. Cohen asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he proposes to revise the guidelines given to his staff engaged in conservation duties, in the light of the proposals contained in the Agriculture Bill; and if he will make a statement.

The Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. Michael Jopling): Assuming that the agriculture Bill passes into law, I shall draw its provisions to the attention of all staff and issue guidance on their implementation.

Mr. Cohen: The Agriculture Bill imposes conservation responsibilities which are to be welcomed, especially on the Agricultural Development and Advisory Service, yet the Minister is cutting the staff that will fulfil those statutory responsibilities. Does that not show that he is paying only lip service to conservation and that he has no realistic commitment to it? When will he provide the additional staff necessary?

Mr. Jopling: I draw the hon. Gentleman's attention to the new clause that we moved to the Agriculture Bill, where we have taken on further responsiblities for conservation.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: I congratulate my right hon. Friend on introducing the new clause, which shows the Government's commitment to conservation. Does he agree that, as well as having guidelines, his officials need training in how to secure a balance between conservation and agriculture? What is my right hon. Friend doing to provide that necessary training?

Mr. Jopling: I am grateful for my hon. Friend's comment. We are arranging courses. There have been a number over the past few years for ADAS staff so that they can better give advice on conservation matters.

Mr. John: Does the Minister not realise that the House will require some details about exactly how the training will be implemented? Is it merely a token or a factor in the chess game currently taking place with the Department of the Environment, or does the right hon. Gentleman really mean it to be effective? If so, how will he make it so?

Mr. Jopling: The hon. Gentleman has complimented my Department on the steps that we are taking to become more and more interested in conservation matters. It is surprising and disappointing therefore that he should question our good will on those matters. We are determined to further our duties for conservation.

Outgoers Scheme

2. Mr. Knox asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he hopes to announce the details of the European Economic Community outgoers scheme which the Commission has proposed; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jopling: Discussions on the proposals for a Community outgoers scheme are continuing in the Council of Agriculture Ministers.

Mr. Knox: Will my right hon. Friend say what plans he has for tenants at the end of their tenancies?

Mr. Jopling: As my hon. Friend will know, under the Agricultural Holdings Act 1986 tenants are entitled to compensation in recognition of the value of improvements they have made on the holding. At the same time, it seems reasonable that they should also receive some recognition of the contribution they have made to the milk quota allocated to the holder. There is a later question on the Order Paper on this subject, but I can say that we are tabling an amendment to the Agriculture Bill today to provide for that.

Mr. Livsey: Does the Minister agree that at least a 50-50 split between tenants and landlords as to the allocation of milk quota in the outgoers scheme would be the right move?

Mr. Jopling: It would be a mistake to start talking about percentages in these terms, because circumstances vary enormously from individual to individual. In general, we should leave the detailed discussions on these matters to arbitrators.

Mr. Hicks: Will my right hon. Friend give the House an assurance that under the amendment that he tables later today the arbitration process will provide no built-in structural advantage to either the landlord or the tenant?

Mr. Jopling: We have had discussions with the representative bodies, the Royal Institution of Chartered Surveyors and the Central Association of Agricultural Valuers, on how this form of arbitration might be worked. We have made our proposals on the basis of those discussions.

Mr. Torney: Will the Minister tell the House whether the Commission's discussions on the outgoers scheme covered the workers in the farming, dairy distributive and processing industries? The workers in those industries have been made unemployed and creameries have been shut down. There is a great difference in redundancy payments for people who will probably never get another job because of the Government's policies on employment.

Mr. Jopling: I am aware that the hon. Gentleman has raised the question of redundancy payments for dairy industry workers over a period of time. I have listened to him, but I have to tell him that when the dairy industry was discussed in the Council of Ministers that particular aspect of the matter was not considered

Sir John Farr: Will the amendment which my right hon. Friend will table today contain references to the matters which arbitrators should and should not take into account when they come to their conclusions?

Mr. Jopling: My hon. Friend will see from the amendment that an attempt has been made to give arbitrators the parameters within which they may work.

Mr. Home Robertson: It is deplorable that the redundancy rights of employees in the dairy industry were not discussed in the Council of Ministers. Will the Minister say more about the Government's attitude towards compensation for tenants and the right of tenants to a fair share of the value of their milk quota? Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that we would oppose any settlement which gave tenants less than 50 per cent. of the value of their quota?

Mr. Jopling: With regard to discussions in the Council of Ministers, although I have many responsibilities, I cannot be responsible — although, at the time, I was temporarily presiding over the Council of Ministers—for what Ministers from other Community countries seek to raise.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: The right hon. Gentleman could have raised it.

Mr. Jopling: This was the first and only occasion on which we had discussed the details of the Commission's proposed outgoers scheme, and redundancy rights of dairy workers were not raised in the course of the discussion.

On his second question, the hon. Member should not get too tied into specific figures with regard to this form of compensation. There is a huge range of different situations, all of which must be treated on their individual merits by the arbitrators at the time.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Is my right hon. Friend aware of the depth of feeling among west country tenant farmers that the present proposals do not adequately recognise their contribution to farming units? Does my right hon. Friend agree that, under his present proposals, the average tenant would receive only about a third of the available compensation? Surely that is inadequate and should not be approved.

Mr. Jopling: We have not yet tabled an amendment, although we shall do so later today. My hon. Friend should think in terms of the burden being put on the ingoing tenant who follows a tenant who received substantial compensation. That is all part of the equation. It is a mistake to attach specific figures, because there will be a wide range of levels of compensation once the arbitrators have done their work.

Beef (Headage Payments)

3. Mr. Geraint Howells asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what talks he has had with colleagues in Europe with a view to altering proposals to pay only headage payments on a limited number of beef fattening animals.

The Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. John Selwyn Gummer): At the meeting of the Agriculture Council on 24 and 25 March my right hon. Friend and I made it clear to our colleagues in the rest of Europe that we were opposed to discrimination between producers being introduced into the CAP market support arrangements.

Mr. Howells: I am sure the Minister will agree that the variable premium has served United Kingdom beef producers and consumers well for the past 12 years. Does he agree that it would be better to press for the retention of the present scheme than to go for the alternative headage payments scheme?

Mr. Gummer: We shall certainly continue to argue the merits of the variable premium scheme. The fact that the Commission is now proposing some sort of premium system is an advance, but it is a fixed premium, not a variable one. Obviously the variable one helps, because it responds to market forces much more effectively.

Sir Hector Monro: Will my right hon. Friend bear in mind that the hill compensatory amount for the suckler cow subsidy and premium are essential to the welfare and economic progress of hill and less-favoured area farms? Will he please make every endeavour to maintain the programme that we have had in the recent past?

Mr. Gummer: I certainly recognise the great importance of those particular arrangements. We are determined to see that proper arrangements continue and, above all, that no arrangement is introduced for beef and ewes which will discriminate against our larger flocks and herds.

Mr. Marlow: Has the Commission any evidence whatever that the livestock sector and, particularly, the cattle fatteners are making an indecent level of profit? If so, what is it? What would happen if there were a restriction on the payments for livestock farmers? Would that not depress store cattle and calf prices, causing a knock-on effect on dairy producers?

Mr. Gummer: I am sure that the Commission does not have that evidence. It is attempting to change the regime so that the present situation, in which meat is taken into storage with the result that it immediately loses value, does not exist. The moment meat goes into cold store, value is lost. The Commission is proposing a range of changes which will take that into account. I hope that my hon. Friend will be both tough with us in determining that the solution is good for Britain, but willing to accept that the Commission is trying to produce a decent answer.

Forestry Commission

4. Dr. Marek asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how much acreage the Forestry Commission currently owns in England and in Wales.

Mr. Jopling: The Forestry Commission does not own any land in England and Wales. Ownership of such land is vested in the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and the Secretary of State for Wales respectively, and the land is formally placed at the disposal of forestry commissioners to manage in accordance with their statutory duties. As at 31 March 1985, the Forestry Commission managed approximately 439,000 hectares of land in England and Wales.

Dr. Marek: In view of the thwarting of the right hon. Gentleman's plans to sell off the family silver, will he accept his defeat by the Secretary of State for Scotland with good grace?

Mr. Jopling: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply given on 21 February by the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland to a question tabled by the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood).

Mr. Adley: Will my right hon. Friend please ensure that sale of any land managed on his behalf by the Forestry Commission is carried out in circumstances that are, and are seen to be, open, honest and above board? Will he give the House an assurance that the Forestry Commission will do no secret deals with developers, and that all land that is sold will be sold on open tender?

Mr. Jopling: The Forestry Commission aims to ensure that all potential purchasers are given proper opportunity to express an interest, and that the maximum price is obtained by using the most appropriate method of sale, whether by formal or informal tender, private treaty or auction.

Mr. Skinner: What is this mania for privatisation? Water, trees. A bloke in Bolsover said to me not so long ago, "Don't go down to the woods today. They've flogged off the forest."

Mr. Jopling: The hon. Member is full of surprises. He continually surprises us with his new moods. I suppose that this is his whimsical mood. I must say that if I were going down to the woods I would not go with the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Cash: Will my right hon. Friend confirm that far too much timber is imported at the moment, that the Forestry Commission does not give enough emphasis to hardwoods and that we should encourage more private enterprise in the hardwood sector and move towards a sytem of auction?

Mr. Jopling: A broadleaves policy was announced last year and is already having a noticeable effect. The Forestry Commission's broadleaved woodland grant scheme has got off to a good start and will mean that many more broadleaves will be planted in future by private owners and that the Commission itself will plant more.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: The largest consumer of timber in the United Kingdom, and the Forestry Commission's largest customer, is Thames Board Mills in my constituency, which produces board. Will the Minister assure us that if privatisation is again placed before Ministers for consideration, that industry, and that company in particular, will be consulted before any Green Paper is published? They would have a statement to make.

Mr. Jopling: I know very well that the hon. Gentleman's constituency contains an important business in this sector. As he will know from the reply of 21 February to which I referred, Government policy on these matters, as in all other areas, is kept under regular review.

Mr. Marland: Under the recent Forestry Act, the Royal Forest of Dean was exempted from any sale. May I ask my right hon. Friend to ensure that if there are any sales of Forestry Commission assets in future, the position of the Royal Forest of Dean will remain inviolate?

Mr. Jopling: I shall bear in mind very carefully everything that my hon. Friend tells me, as I have done on almost all subjects over the past three years.

Mr. John: Does the right hon. Gentleman not realise that his first non-answer will strengthen the unworthy suspicion among forestry people that, despite his defeat by his ministerial colleagues, he still hankers after a massive disposition of forestry land? Will the Minister assure us that there will be no major disposition of land managed by the Forestry Commission before the next general election?

Mr. Jopling: The hon. Gentleman must not put words into my mouth.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Answer the question.

Mr. Jopling: I have no more to say than what I said in my earlier answer, part of which I repeated a few seconds ago. Like all other areas of Government activity, the matter is kept under regular review.

Mr. Greenway: Ramblers, walkers and horse riders from urban and rural areas fear that they will lose their rights of access to Forestry Commission land if they are privatised. Will my right hon. Friend undertake that such rights will not be lost if Forestry Commission land is privatised?

Mr. Jopling: Under the existing disposal arrangements, of which the House is aware and to which it has agreed, such matters are kept under careful review all the time.

Intervention Stores

5. Mr. Winnick asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the total stock of beef, butter, skimmed milk and cereals held in European Economic Community intervention stores in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Gummer: As at 28 February 1986 stocks of beef, butter, skimmed milk powder and cereals held in United Kingdom intervention stores totalled 6.065 million tonnes.

Mr. Winnick: Is it not a crazy system in which so much food is removed in order to ensure that prices are kept higher than they would normally be? How much longer can the CAP be tolerated? As for all the items mentioned by the Minister, instead of selling them off to the Russians at much reduced prices, why should we not sell them off to pensioners and others on low incomes in our own country as well as perhaps, where appropriate, assisting people in the countries in Africa, where starvation and hunger prevail?

Mr. Gummer: On the last part of the question, the hon. Gentleman should talk to the aid agencies, all of which are concerned that we should not sell this food cheaply to countries in Africa and have asked us not to do so because it undermines the indigenous agriculture. The hon. Gentleman's information is 10 years out of date. As to why we do not sell it cheaply to our own people, we are completely in favour of doing that, and we do it where it does not mean a reduction in consumption under normal arrangements, as that would only increase the amount in store.

Mr. Key: Does my right hon. Friend agree that most of the problems in British agriculture are problems of success and that no one wants to reduce input costs more than farmers do? Will he seriously consider any request from the Natural Environment Research Council to carry out a major ecological study into the effects on our water and land of nitrogen and phosphorus? Will he consider financing, or helping to finance, such a project?

Mr. Gummer: That matter is constantly under review and we would appreciate any additional information from my hon. Friend. It is better to attempt to deal with the problems of plenty than with the problems of shortage, which we would have had without the CAP.

Mr. Deakins: As we did not have such disgracefully large stocks when Britain had its own agricultural policy, is not the only remedy after 10 or more years of the CAP, to get out of the CAP and have an independent policy?

Mr. Gummer: The present system was renegotiated by the Labour Government. Surpluses are a worldwide problem, and the idea that the hon. Gentleman can lay the blame for them at the door of the Common Market is sheer nonsense. If we returned to deficiency payments it would cost us nearly twice as much as the present system.

Mr. Marlow: What was the value of the 6 million tonnes, and how much did the British taxpayer have to pay last year in intervention and stockholding costs in advance of sale of these commodities from store?

Mr. Gummer: I shall be happy to answer the second part of my hon. Friend's question if he will put it down separately. The value of the present stores is £387 million of butter, £240 million of beef, £41 million of skimmed milk and £692 million of cereals.

Mr. Evans: How much of the foodstuffs held in intervention stores in the United Kingdom are unfit for human consumption? If the Minister does not have the figures now, will he supply them to me later?

Mr. Gummer: One reason for the high cost of keeping those goods in intervention is that we are keeping them so that they will be fit for human consumption. I shall consider the hon. Gentleman's point carefully.

Mr. Livsey: Does the Minister agree that he was incorrect to state on television on Sunday that the disposal of butter and beef has caused similar problems of reduction of price for European consumers, when it is well known that the elasticity of demand for beef differs from that of butter, and that a small reduction in the price of beef to our consumers would result in a large increase in beef consumption?

Mr. Gummer: I do not agree that what I said on television on Sunday was wrong; nor do I agree with the hon. Gentleman's point.

Mr. Home Robertson: As next year's surpluses are already growing in the fields, does the Minister accept the Government's responsibility to help agriculture to reduce production before the surpluses become bigger? Before there are any more cut-price bargain offers to Libya, Russia or anywhere else, may we have an undertaking that the poor people of Britain will at least have first refusal on the surpluses?

Mr. Gummer: In reply to the second part of the hon. Gentleman's question, I refer him to my reply to the hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick). Wherever possible, the Government are determined, without increasing the amount of goods in store, to help British people. The hon. Gentleman knows that that is true, and it is no good his stirring it up for party political reasons. In reply to the hon. Gentleman's first point, we cannot stop the amount that is being grown this year, because, as the hon. Gentleman says, it is already in the ground. The Government's policy is to arrive at a common agricultural policy which much more closely matches supply with demand.

Mr. Colin Shepherd: In dealing with the problem of disposing of surpluses internally, will my right hon. Friend bear carefully in mind, and demonstrate the point adequately to Labour Members, that when beef was introduced to pensioners in the early 1970s by the beef token scheme it very nearly wrecked the poultry industry? Action in one sector can have a devastating knock-on effect in another.

Mr. Gummer: My hon. Friend is perfectly right. I hope he will agree that when we tried to introduce the Christmas butter scheme people bought the butter at the reduced price, put it into their freezers, and as a result did not buy ordinary butter, and we took a lot of extra butter, at a high price, into the very intervention stores to which Labour Members object.

Food and Drink Marketing

6. Mr. Thurnham asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what are the objectives of his Ministry's policy on the processing, distribution and marketing of food and drink; how he is monitoring its effectiveness; and if he will make a statement.

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mrs. Peggy Fenner): The Government's policy is to encourage improvements in the processing, distribution and marketing of food, and to ensure high standards of food hygiene and safety. My Department monitors many of the fundamental measures of the industry's performance and operates an extensive system of surveillance to check on the safety of foods.

Mr. Thurnham: Is my hon. Friend satisfied that Rayner scrutiny techniques are being used to the best effect in the Department, and what results are being achieved?

Mrs. Fenner: There was no specific Rayner scrutiny in the area of food and drink, but we are looking closely at our objectives in all areas and at associated measures of efficiency and effectiveness.

Mr. Cohen: How about giving a higher priority to quality and types of food for good health? Britain is at the top of the coronary deaths league, and improper diet is recognised as a key factor in that. When will the Government face their responsibilities in that area and, instead of facilitating the search for unlimited profit, put some action into the search for better health?

Mrs. Fenner: Health is the direct responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Minister for Health. The hon. Gentleman will be aware that a committee looked particularly into any connection between diet and cardiovascular disease. It made four recommendations, only one of which affects labelling in my Department, and that is statutory fat labelling, which we are now preparing. The other recommendations did not involve labelling. We are also discussing and preparing a voluntary format for other nutritional labellings, because consumers are interested in that.

Mr. Gregory: Will my hon. Friend hold urgent discussions with Food from Britain on the objectives of her marketing policy, because of the organisation's lack-lustre performance, particularly in respect of confectionery and good English drinks, such as beer, because at present on the export market that is singularly lacking?

Mrs. Fenner: Not only does Food from Britain place a priority on confectionery, but I know from visiting food exhibitions in other countries that it is doing a good job. My hon. Friend will know that when the £14 million pump-priming funds run out, the Government have pledged £1 for every £2 from industry. We have given the lead, and it is now up to industry to show that it will follow that.

Agricultural Workers (Wages)

7. Miss Maynard asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether, in the current negotiations on agricultural workers' wages, information concerning the annual incomes of those farmers who employ labour will be made available to the chairman of the Agricultural Wages Board; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jopling: Although it was not possible to provide such information during the recent negotiations, as a result of current developments in processing the relevant data the information should be available in time for the next wage round.

Miss Maynard: Is the Secretary of State aware that the National Farmers Union made a survey of farm incomes relating to farmers who employ labour, but was unwilling to give that information to the Agricultural Wages Board during the current wage negotiations?

Mr. Jopling: As the hon. Lady knows, what goes on in the business and meetings of the Agricultural Wages Board is not a matter for me, but I hope that it will be possible to provide that information to the Agricultural Wages Board for the next wage round. We are currently reviewing the analysis of the farm management survey, which would provide that information.

Sir John Farr: Will my right hon. Friend confirm that the chairman would have available the detail relating to farm incomes in the appropriate year, and moreover that he would be aware that incomes off the farm declined by about 60 per cent. last year?

Mr. Jopling: As in the past, my Department has supplied the chairman and members of the Agricultural Wages Board with as much information as it is possible to give them, but, as I said, in this case considerable computer programming and other resources would have been needed to provide such information, and those resources were just not available at the time.

Mr. Randall: I welcome what the Minister said in reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Brightside (Miss Maynard), but does he agree that farm workers have been paid far too little for far too long for what are very high skills? Given the appalling situation that now exists, I hope that some positive steps will be taken to correct the situation. Will the Minister assure us that he will use his influence on the Agricultural Wages Board to make sure that in the end we have a much fairer deal for agricultural workers?

Mr. Jopling: I think the hon. Gentleman will forgive me if I say that that is a rather surprising question, because the statutory minimum rates are a matter for the independent Agricultural Wages Board. They are not a matter for Ministers. As to using my influence, I think that in certain circumstances the hon. Gentleman would raise the roof were I to attempt to do so. I do not intend so to do.

Cereals

8. Mr. Evans asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is his estimate of the cut in farmgate prices of cereals which would be necessary to secure a diminution in the overall level of production of cereals within the European Economic Community.

Mr. Gummer: Lower prices will, over time, lead to lower production than would otherwise have occurred, but as I an unable to predict either the weather or the speed of technological change, I cannot predict accurately what amount of price reduction will be necessary to produce a given amount of production.

Mr. Evans: Putting that answer on one side, does the Minister agree that substantial cuts in producers' prices would not only damage farmers' incomes but would have a devastating effect on rural employment and the rural economy, which have already been badly damaged by the actions of the Government over the past five years? Would it not be more intelligent to have a more sensible, balanced package of measures which would include some measure of quotas, which would be beneficial to farmers of marginal land?

Mr. Gummer: No system of quotas or anything else will be sensible if one does not take into account the fact that weather changes from year to year and that the speed of technological change alters the amount of excess with which one has to deal. The hon. Gentleman cannot just ignore those two basic facts. For that reason, he will know that we are working for a package that will meet those needs. The hon. Gentleman cannot get out of the situation that the proposal that he has put forward would not be acceptable to any part of the industry.

Mr. Bill Walker: Will my right hon. Friend bear in mind, when looking at the production of wheat and cereals, that in Scotland feed wheat is commercially grown there and that we are not in a state of surplus? In fact we are substantially short of a surplus. This factor has to be borne in mind, because it affects many other issues.

Mr. Gummer: We have to look at the surpluses in the Community as a whole in all commodities. It would not be possible to maintain a system under which we went on increasing the surpluses in the rest of the United Kingdom and, indeed, in the rest of the European Community until such time as every part was self-sufficient. But my hon. Friend is absolutely right to say that the arrangements that we make must take into account the particular problems of Scotland and the growth of wheat in Scotland.

Mr. John: I thought that it was only the Department of the Environment with which the right hon. Gentleman quarrelled, but now he is quarrelling with the Minister of Agriculture. As the Minister has told us repeatedly that surpluses are to be controlled by cutting farmgate prices, how on earth are we to take that seriously if he cannot even estimate what cut is necessary to bring down production?

Mr. Gummer: The hon. Gentleman, who leads for the Opposition, must accept that last year's harvest, in both quantity and quality, was very much affected by the weather, as was the previous year's harvest. The question that was tabled asked whether I would predict what price would result in a given amount of production. Any Minister who did that would be damned foolish.

Mr. Leigh: If it is considered impossible to obtain a consensus in Europe on the level of price restraint deemed necessary to curb over-production, and if it is considered necessary to add a policy of set-aside to price restraint, does my right hon. Friend agree that compulsory set-aside should be resisted, as it would favour the less productive cereal-growing areas, and that a suitable way forward might be voluntary set-aside coupled with price restraint and tax incentives to encourage farmers to move into alternative crops, such as forestry?

Mr. Gummer: In our discussions with the Council of Ministers my right hon. Friend made it clear that one of the matters that we should like to have looked at very carefully was the principle of voluntary set-aside. I am sure that much, if not all, of what my hon. Friend has said is right.

Food Standards (Advisory Committees)

9. Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what form of words encompasses the confidentiality agreed for members of advisory committees on food standards.

Mrs. Fenner: When they are appointed, members of the Food Advisory Committee are informed that under the terms of the Official Secrets Act information given to them in their capacity as members of the committee should not be disclosed outside the committee.

Mr. Meadowcroft: In view of the Minister's reply, why did she write to her hon. Friend the Member for Thanet, South (Mr. Aitken) on 23 May stating categorically that the members of those two committees are required to sign the Official Secrets Act, although her right hon. Friend, who is sitting next to her, denied that in March of this year?

Mrs. Fenner: They are not required to sign the Official Secrets Act, but the answer that I have just given to the hon. Gentleman is conveyed to them. That is only in respect of commercial confidentiality, because full reports of the advice of that committee and of the committee on toxicity are published by Her Majesty's Stationery Office.

Mr. Aitken: Although I am sure that my hon. Friend is almost as surprised as I am that our previous billets doux on the subject of official secrecy have been revealed this afternoon by the Liberal party, will she nevertheless consider the absurdity of the Government's position? Surely it is unrealistic and unwise to invoke the criminal law when food advice should be the subject of maximum publicity, rather than the subject of maximum secrecy?

Mrs. Fenner: It is common practice for all Governments to respect commercial confidentiality and not to divulge information from one company that might be of direct benefit to its competitors. I assure my hon. Friend that the information is totally exposed when safety is involved. If he feels that it is not sufficiently accessible, I remind him that my right hon. Friend has already told the House that we are having discussions with the British Library to ensure that all such information is placed in that library, so that it might be more accessible to the public.

Mr. Randall: Is the Minister aware that a great deal of suspicion surrounds the operations of the Food Advisory Committee? I recognise the need for certain commercial confidentiality, but does she agree that the time has come for more openness by this public body?

Mrs. Fenner: I realise that the hon. Gentleman prepared his question before I gave my previous answer. I hope that I have reassured him by repeating what my right hon. Friend has said, namely, that we are discussing arrangements for placing that information in the British Library. At the moment we exhort all sources of such research to make it public, but it is very difficult to get the information into scientific journals, because sometimes it is rather pedestrian and pretty dull. Therefore, we are discussing whether it can possibly be placed in the British Library.

Dairy Quotas

10. Mr. Phillip Oppenheim asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what measures he will take to encourage the European Economic Community to extend the more flexible dairy quota scheme beyond an initial one-year period.

Mr. Gummer: The Commission has not proposed extending this provision. We shall need to consider very carefully our position on this, because I see some difficulty in justifying the continuation of a measure which limits the effectiveness of the quota system while we still have a 14½ million tonne surplus of milk.

Mr. Oppenheim: I welcome the Government's success in encouraging the European Economic Community to accept the principle of flexibility, but will my right hon. Friend commit himself to pushing as hard as possible for that flexibility to be extended beyond the first year, because that is essential for the efficiency of the dairy sector?

Mr. Gummer: The flexibility which is important is the ability to lease or to buy quotas. That is the flexibility which we particularly need and which we have not yet won.

Forestry

11. Mr. Yeo asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food by how much the total acreage planted for forestry in England and Wales has changed in the last year for which figures are available.

Mr. Jopling: Between 1 April 1984 and 31 March 1985 the total area of new planting in England and Wales by the Forestry Commission and by private woodland owners with the aid of Commission grants was 2,222 hectares, compared with 3,216 hectares in the previous 12-month period.

Mr. Yeo: Does my right hon. Friend agree that it would be highly desirable for more land to be devoted to forestry and less to producing those crops which are already in surplus? Will he, therefore, consider introducing additional incentives to increase the amount of land devoted to forestry?

Mr. Jopling: I shall certainly consider that, but my hon. Friend should know that the Government's policy is to encourage the expansion of forestry in ways consistent with the needs of other rural interests. Substantial funding of private forestry takes place through the Forestry Commission's grant schemes, and there has been a significant rise in private planting levels over the past few years.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Corbyn asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 10 April.

The Prime Minister (Mrs. Margaret Thatcher): This morning I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I shall be having further meetings later today.

Mr. Corbyn: Will the Prime Minister tell us whether she has confidence in her lame duck Secretary of State for Education and Science or in the governors of Christ's college school in her constituency, who have decided under the chairmanship of the former chairman of the Finchley Conservative party, Councillor John Tiplady, that it is impractical to proceed with the general certificate of secondary education examination course starting this September?

The Prime Minister: I have great confidence in my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science, and so have my constituents.

Mr. Mudd: Will my right hon. Friend reflect, in the period between her other meetings today, on the fact that that if the roof of a Cornish tin mine fell in and three Cornish tin miners were killed the world would see a flurry of activity at Westminster and Whitehall and much attention paid to the Cornish crisis? Yet one Cornish tin mine has closed, 270 jobs have died and the life of a community is in peril. Why is there not the same interest on the part of Whitehall in this crisis in Cornwall to which we expect the Government to respond?

The Prime Minister: I have made it clear on previous occasions that the Government would be prepared to consider applications for projects to bring the tin mines up to commercial viability. I understand that the Department of Trade and Industry has received an application for assistance from the Geevor tin mine. It will be considered as soon as possible.

Dr. Owen: Will the Prime Minister confirm that she has offered talks on an open agenda to the leaders of the Ulster political parties and that the right hon. Member for Lagan Valley (Mr. Molyneaux) was wrong when he said in a radio interview today that the talks are not open but conditional? Will she confirm that there are no preconditions on either side?

The Prime Minister: I have made it absolutely clear that the Anglo-Irish accord, endorsed by the House and the other place, will continue and will be implemented. I would very much like, nevertheless, to have talks with the representatives of the Unionist party on matters which have been previously identified and on other matters if they wish to bring them up.

Mr. Adley: Is my right hon. Friend aware that British publishers are losing tens of millions of pounds through piracy, and that the two countries with the worst record in this regard are Taiwan and South Korea? Has she raised with Mr. Chun during his visit the problems that his country's companies are causing British publishers? If not, will she please do so?

The Prime Minister: I did not raise that particular matter with the President. I believe that it was raised by the Department of Trade and Industry. We are greatly concerned about it. Singapore is another country which is taking action, I understand.

Q2. Mr. Mikardo asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 10 April.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Mikardo: I thank the right hon. Lady for that reply. Will she have time today to reply to a letter that she received some time ago from the general secretary of the Association of Scientific, Technical and Managerial Staffs about the deteriorating position in the Westland factory at Weston-super-Mare? Will she have time today to tell United Technologies that if it is operating factories in Great Britain it must do so within the framework of British and not American labour law?

The Prime Minister: If it is a matter for the law, it will be a matter for my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General. If it concerns only a private sector company, it is a matter for the company.

Q3. Mrs. Peacock asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 10 April.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mrs. Peacock: Has my right hon. Friend had an opportunity today to read the leader in The Times, which suggests that the Government will not honour the Anglo-Irish agreement? Will she confirm to the House that she is totally committed to its success and to its implementation?

The Prime Minister: Yes. As I have indicated, the Government are committed to the Anglo-Irish accord and to its implementation, and will continue to implement it. Of course, we should also like to talk to the Unionists on the basis which I indicated previously, on particular points. I hope that the Unionists will take advantage of that opportunity to come and talk, but the accord will continue.

Mr. Kinnock: May I first say that a continuing commitment to the accord, coupled with a dialogue with people from the Unionist section of the community in Northern Ireland, is an intelligent approach which will be supported on the Labour side of the House?

Is the Prime Minister aware that there is widespread support among the disabled and the professional and voluntary organisations that have particular care for the disabled for the private Member's Bill that has been introduced by my hon. Friend the Member for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke)? Will she give an undertaking that when the Bill is debated tomorrow the Government will not introduce any amendments that would weaken or in any way impede its principles as introduced by my hon. Friend?

The Prime Minister: As the right hon. Gentleman is aware, the Government have tabled certain amendments to the Bill which we believe will make proper provision without imposing undue burdens on local authorities.

Mr. Kinnock: The Government's approach to the Bill is cheap and nasty. Will the Prime Minister accept that, in the interests of humanity and efficiency in providing proper care for the disabled, and in the interests of those who care for them and save the country £5 billion a year, the Bill would go much of the way towards ensuring that the disabled are properly represented and that information about their cases is properly communicated?

The Prime Minister: When it comes to expressing concern for the disabled, this Government have an extremely good record—better than that of any previous Government. [Interruption.] We have increased spending on benefits for the long-term sick and disabled by over one third in real terms to over £4·5 billion. Associations representing the disabled made it clear when we came into office that their main priority was a speeding-up of the introduction of the mobility allowance, which we did. We increased substantially its value. We made it non-taxable and we increased spending—[Interruption]——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Prime Minister was asked a question. She is giving the answer and the House should listen.

The Prime Minister: We increased spending on the mobility allowance by four and a half times in real terms. It is not for the right hon. Gentleman to criticise the record of this Government on help for the disabled.

Mr. Kinnock: Surely the right hon. Lady must know that no one who is disabled or who cares for the disabled can accept the description of her policies that she has offered. It does not stand up in practice. Is it not the case that she heads a Government who cut the invalidity allowance? Have not her Government inflicted cuts on local government which have prevented it fulfilling even its statutory duties towards the disabled? Will she further accept that all the advances that have been made under her Government were originated by the last Labour Government? If the Prime Minister cares as much as she says she cares, surely supporting my hon. Friend's Bill would be a very small addition to what she has already done.

The Prime Minister: Which of the facts that I have given does the right hon. Gentleman quarrel with? In addition, we have extended the long-term supplementary rate to many disabled people, we have extended the entitlement to invalidity care allowance to non-relatives, and we have abolished the invalidity trap, which will benefit over 50,000 disabled people. It is an excellent record for disabled people, and all the finance has been found in the lifetime of this Government.

Mr. Parris: Can my right hon. Friend find time to express to Fidel Castro, through the Cuban ambassador, her congratulations on his decision to sell Cuban council houses to their existing tenants?

The Prime Minister: I confess that I do not regard that as of top priority today, but any move towards capitalism and freedom by a Communist society is welcome.

Mr. Douglas: Will the Prime Minister find time in her busy day to reply to a letter that I sent her in relation to the ordering of auxiliary oil replenishment vessels? Will she give us some indication that the rules in terms of procurement policy have been obeyed here? In addition, will she end the speculation in relation to the ordering of type 23 frigates 02, 03 and 04 and confirm that some of those orders will go to Yarrow as the lead yard?

The Prime Minister: As I have said, the figures on the AORs are being looked at to ensure that the competition is fair. I have no further statement to make at present.

Q4. Mr. Cockeram asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 10 April.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Cockeram: Is my right hon. Friend not concerned that, following the drop in world oil prices, our electricity generating industry is still paying historic and artificially high prices for its coal, with the consequence that our electricity prices to British industry are higher than those on the continent? Is she aware that this is having detrimental effects on employment in industry? Will the Prime Minister seek to ensure that this further hidden subsidy to the coal industry is ended?

The Prime Minister: I think my hon. Friend will agree that what he says is very good evidence of the wisdom of this Government's policy for the coal industry of getting rid of uneconomic pits and concentrating on economic pits that have good seams and where higher productivity can produce lower-priced coal, to the benefit both of the coal industry and of the electricity industry. He is quite right. The electricity supply industry will have to be in touch with the National Coal Board about the price of coal to enable electricity suppliers to pass on some of the reductions that people have been expecting since the fall in the price of oil.

Q5. Mr. Simon Hughes asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 10 April.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Hughes: Will the Prime Minister accept that some of the Government's policies for the inner city, ring pretty hollow when, at the same time as money is cut back for housing for rent in the public and private sector and there is in the south-east an 11·8 per cent. increase in the cost of housing, in docklands a former criminal can run a docklands property centre which in 18 months has been able, as a result of insider dealing, to resell housing bought for £75,000 at prices of £250,000 and above? Will she make sure that her right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General and her right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment investigate the abuse and exploitation of housing in the inner city, to the detriment of people who desperately need to be housed?

The Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman will be aware that the amount devoted to the urban grant has been greatly increased during the lifetime of this Government. Moreover, I am sure that he would be the first to wish to congratulate the Government on the London docklands authority, which has done things for that part of London that have never been done before under any Government, including the provision of much cheaper housing.

Q6. Mr. David Atkinson asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 10 April.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Atkinson: Will my right hon. Friend resist any temptation to compromise on the Shops Bill, which, although superficially attractive, would lead only to new anomalies, unenforceable laws and, in the suggestion of passing the buck to local authorities, would only add to the nationwide hotch-potch of local standards that already exist for pub hours, sex shops and the fluoridation of water supplies? Will she tell the House that next week we will have a straight choice between freedom of choice on Sunday observance and the strict and costly enforcement of the existing criminal law by local authorities?

The Prime Minister: I believe that it is common ground that the present law is unenforceable, and that if one attempted to enforce it, that would have the effects that my hon. Friend has described. Many people will share my hon. Friend's view. The proposals are contained in the Bill which I have reason to believe will be before the House shortly.

Business of the House

3.31 pm

Mr. Neil Kinnock (Islwyn): May I ask the Leader of the Houe to state the business for next week?

The Lord Privy Seal and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Biffen): Yes, Sir. The business for next week will be as follows:

TUESDAY 15 APRIL—Timetable motion on the Social Security Bill.

Second Reading of the National Health Service (Amendment) Bill.

FRIDAY 18 APRIL—Private Members' Bills.

MONDAY 21 APRIL—Opposition Day (12th Allotted Day) there will be a debate on an Opposition motion. The subject for debate to be announced.

Legal Aid (Assessment of Resources) (Amendment) Regulations 1986

Legal Advice and Assistance (Amendment) Regulations (Northern Ireland) 1986

Legal Advice and Assistance (Scotland) Amendment Regulations 1986

Legal Advice and Assistance (Amendment) Regulations 1986.]

Mr. Kinnock: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman. Will he give an undertaking to use his considerable influence to ensure that there is a free vote among Conservative Members on the Second Reading of the Shops Bill next Monday? As he is a supporter of choice, does he not believe that choice should be extended to members of his own party as well as to other hon. Members over something that is very much a matter of conscience for many hon. Members? Will the right hon. Gentleman give an undertaking to discuss through the usual channels the possibility of giving extra time for the debate on Monday night?

During the debate on the legal aid and advice orders next Tuesday, serious and very complicated matters will arise that will require extensive examination. May we have extra time for that debate?

May I remind the Leader of the House of his promise before the Easter recess of a debate on the future of British Leyland and its constituent parts? Will he ensure that the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry comes to the House as quickly as possible to make a statement about the recent developments and, in particular, the claim by current bidders, as reported in this morning's edition of the Financial Times, that they had been "misled" by the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry?

Last weekend's letter from the National Advisory Body for Public Sector Higher Education to polytechnic directors caused justifiable alarm at the proposed cuts in the next academic year. The knowledge that the University Grants Committee is preparing letters for all universities to plan 2 per cent. cuts in the same year is likely to meet a similar alarmed response. There is widespread concern at the continuing reduction in opportunities at universities and other institutions for higher education for young people with the necessary qualifications. Will the right hon. Gentleman grant Government time very soon for a proper debate on higher education before the NAB and the UGC have their proposals taken any further?

Finally, can the Leader of the House ensure that an opportunity is granted soon for a debate on the test ban treaty? This and many other international issues are growing in importance and completely justify the allocation very soon of at least two days for a comprehensive foreign affairs debate.

Mr. Biffen: The right hon. Gentleman will realise that the conventions of voting lie with my right hon. Friend the Patronage Secretary, who will have heard the eloquent plea just made and will evaluate it accordingly.

I realise that the Shops Bill is causing concern in all parts of the House, and I shall be happy to have the matter of extra time for debate further considered through the usual channels.

Perhaps we can also consider, through the usual channels, the timing and duration of Tuesday evening's debate on the orders on legal aid matters.

Obviously, I stand by the previous statements I have made about the timing of the debate on British Leyland. Meanwhile, I will convey to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry the right hon. Gentleman's interest in a statement on this matter.

I take note of what the right hon. Gentleman says about the desirability of a debate on the higher education problems, related to the work of the National Advisory Body and the University Grants Committee. We will consider the matter through the usual channels and there is at least a chance of having a debate on education on Wednesday next week.

Finally, I take at once the point the right hon. Gentleman makes about the test ban treaty, underlining the importance of a foreign affairs debate; perhaps we might consider that matter further.

Sir Paul Bryan (Boothferry): Do the Government intend to have the Shops Bill committed to a Special Standing Committee?

Mr. Biffen: Such a matter, by tradition, is discussed through the usual channels, but I take note of my hon. Friend's interest in it. I believe there would be merit in such a procedure, and we might consider it.

Mr. David Alton (Liverpool, Mossley Hill): Given that the proposal to introduce Sunday trading was not contained in the 1983 Conservative party manifesto, will the Leader of the House accept that opinion on these Benches very much supports the idea that there should be a free vote? Will he communicate that fact to the Patronage Secretary? Will he also accept that many of us would like the debate extended to midnight on Monday, so that all sides of the question can be put?

I notify the Leader of the House that, during the debate on Thursday next, the Liberal party and the Social Democratic party intend to move a motion of no confidence in his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education.

Mr. Biffen: As to the final point, we will bear the rigours of a "no confidence" vote with such equanimity as we can muster. The hon. Gentleman will appreciate that the points he made earlier about the Shops Bill were also made by the Leader of the Opposition, and I am favourably disposed to both requests.

Sir William Clark (Croydon, South): Will my right hon. Friend consider an early debate on the future of occupational pensions? Is he aware of the urgency of this matter? If occupational pension funds were forced to invest in a national investment bank, which would invest in lame ducks, it would affect 11 million occupational pensioners who are looking forward to pensions for which they have subscribed?

Mr. Biffen: My hon. Friend makes an extremely fair and pertinent point. I have no doubt that we shall recognise that one of the new badges of Socialism is not the ownership of equity by the state, but the political direction of private funds. I cannot immediately offer the prospect of a debate, but I suspect that the course of the Finance Bill itself will allow the matter to be dealt with.

Mr. Peter Shore (Bethnal Green): In view of your important ruling yesterday, Mr. Speaker, on hybridity with respect to the Airports Bill and Manchester airport, when does the Leader of the House expect to announce the formation of a Joint Committee on Private Bill Procedure which can fully consider hybridity and other matters?

Mr. Biffen: The matter is under consideration. I hope to be in touch with the right hon. Gentleman about it.

Sir John Biggs-Davison (Epping Forest): Has my right hon. Friend noticed that the substantial support by both sides of the House for early-day motion 280 is still growing?

[That this House notes the widespread concern felt in Parliament by eminent scientists, by other responsible observers and by members of the public who have viewed programmes on the matter screened by Channel 4, that Anne Maguire, Patrick Maguire (senior), Vincent Maguire (then aged 17), Patrick Maguire (then aged 14), Sean Smyth, Patrick O'Neill and the late Giuseppe Conlon, sentenced in 1976 to long terms of imprisonment since served, now appear, despite confirmation of their convictions at the time by the Court of Appeal, to have been entirely innocent of the crime with which they were charged; further notes at the conclusion of a debate in the other place on 17th May 1975, the recognition by the Parliamentary Under-Secretary at the Home Office of the strength of feeling on this matter in that House and his pledge to draw the attention of the Secretary of State for the Home Department to what had been said; and therefore earnestly urges the Secretary of State for the Home Department in the interests of the highest standards of British justice of which this country needs to feel rightly proud, to move without delay for a review of these convictions, either under the provisions of section 17 of the Criminal Appeal Act 1968, or by such other public process of review as he may deem appropriate to this disturbing case.]

Will we at least have an interim statement next week on the Government's position on the miscarriage of justice in the Maguire case?

Mr. Biffen: My hon. Friend has made this point to me a number of times. I shall certainly look at the matter and refer it to the appropriate Department so that it is considered.

Mr. Alfred Morris (Manchester, Wythenshawe): Further to the right hon. Gentleman's reply to my right hon. Friend the Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore), is he prepared to refer to the Joint Committee my exchange of correspondence with Mr. Speaker about hybridity and the Airports Bill?

Mr. Biffen: I cannot answer that question specifically in the terms in which it has been presented. I think that we should wait until we have had initial discussions on the topic. I shall bear the right hon. Gentleman's anxiety in mind.

Sir Dudley Smith (Warwick and Leamington): Is my right hon. Friend aware that the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Bill passed its Committee stage just before Easter with flying colours? Because that legislation is well in advance of other European legislation and because it deals specifically with animal rights, will my right hon. Friend consider bringing forward the Report and Third Reading stages sooner rather than later?

Mr. Biffen: I take note of my hon. Friend's comments. I should like to underline what he said about the way in which the Bill was handled in Committee. I think that my hon. Friend will appreciate that, at this time of the year, there are a number of competitors for parliamentary time.

Mr. Jack Ashley (Stoke-on-Trent, South): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that nearly two months have passed since a deputation went to see the Secretary of State for Defence? That deputation was composed of hon. Members on both sides of the House, gravely disabled service men who had been crippled by alleged negligence and the parents of service men who had been burned to death, again by alleged negligence. The deputation asked the Secretary of State to repeal section 10 of the Crown Proceedings Act 1947 and to enable disabled service men on non-combatant duties or their survivors to claim the same compensation as that claimed by any other public servant. However, we have not received a reply from the Secretary of State. Will a statement be made next week?

Mr. Biffen: I appreciate that point and the difficulty that would be faced in raising it on Second Reading of the National Health Service (Amendment) Bill. Those matters are not totally unrelated. I shall refer the right hon. Gentleman's point to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence.

Sir Adam Butler (Bosworth): Does my right hon. Friend accept that many Conservative Members object to the fundamental principle of total deregulation in the Shops Bill? Does he accept also that we want change and would genuinely like to help him put the right legislation on the statute book? Does he agree that, during Monday's debate, one or both of the Ministers should give us a categorical assurance that the Government will support amendments that would remove total deregulation in a suitable way?

Mr. Biffen: I very much appreciate my hon. Friend's point about the necessity for legislation and about the vitality of the debate about the appropriate type of legislation. I shall certainly draw the attention of my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary to that point.

Mr. Dafydd Wigley (Caernarfon): About the business on Friday next week, will the right hon. Gentleman confirm that, if the Disabled Persons (Services, Consultation and Representation) Bill is talked out tomorrow because of the intervention of the Government Whips Office—which has asked Conservative Members to talk at length on the Bill—that will happen on the very day that the Prime Minister is visiting disabled people in Devon? Will the right hon. Gentleman assure us that there will be time next Friday to consider that legislation?

Mr. Biffen: The usual procedures will be followed.

Sir John Farr (Harborough): Can my right hon. Friend set at rest the fears of those in the knitwear and hosiery trade about the current negotiations on the future multi-fibre arrangement? If the discussions come to a head, as they may well do, within the next week or two, will he arrange for any proposals to be placed before the House?

Mr. Biffen: I know that my hon. Friend will appreciate that the House debated the multi-fibre arrangement on 13 February. Negotiations on renewal of the multi-fibre arrangement are under way and the House will be kept informed of progress.

Mr. Andrew Faulds (Warley, East): As the right hon. Gentleman will know, tomorrow Christie's is quite improperly auctioning a painting by Goya which the Spanish Government—[HON. MEMBERS: "No."] In that case I shall withdraw my question. I am relieved to hear the change of mind by Christie's.

Hon. Members: It has been sold.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not know whether there is any Government responsibility for that.

Mr. Conal Gregory (York): Will my right hon. Friend find time during the following week to have a major debate on Britain's fastest growth industry, tourism, in view of the slur that the chairman of ICI has made equating service with servility? We should also debate the fact that this country desperately needs a growth in manufacturing industry as well as in tourism and a chance to debate the Select Committee on Trade and Industry's report?

Mr. Biffen: Before I answer that, perhaps I might be allowed to maintain my self-sought standard of being a philistine. I did not know that Christie's was selling a painting tomorrow.

I am attracted to the fact that there should be an opportunity for the House to debate tourism, which is such an important element in our economy and provides so many jobs. I think that my hon. Friend may find that the Committee on the Finance Bill will give him the chance he is looking for, one way or another.

Mr. Roland Boyes (Houghton and Washington): Will the Leader of the House investigate and make a statement on press speculation that the Prime Minister is to be invited to open the Nissan factory in the north-east of England? As the Member of Parliament for that constituency, I would find her presence unwelcome and unacceptable because of the great damage that the Government's policies have caused to the economy of the north-east and the suffering they have caused our people in the region with the highest unemployment in Great Britain. Further than that, it would be an insult to the three authorities which negotiated the Nissan deal to attract it to my area. It is totally unacceptable and we do not want her there.

Mr. Biffen: Well there we are. I must say that many people in the north-east, earning a great deal less than the hon. Gentleman, will be only too delighted to see Nissan located there and will be happy to see the authority of this country symbolised by the commitment of the Prime Minister to that project. I do not know whether she is going but I shall refer the hon. Gentleman's comments to my right hon. Friend.

Mr. Kenneth Warren (Hastings and Rye): Bearing in mind the fact that my right hon. Friend is aware that over two weeks ago the Select Committee on Trade and Industry published a unanimous report on the tin crisis, will he persuade his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry to come to the House next week to reply to that report and tell the House what the Government will do to help the Cornish tin miners, before there are none left? Will he give time, as recommended in the report, for a debate on the refusal of the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry to allow civil servants to answer our questions in full or to answer them himself?

Mr. Biffen: My hon. Friend has raised an important point and I shall certainly look into it.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): Does the leader of the House recollect that, during the Easter Adjournment debate he undertook to look, with the Ministry of Defence and the Treasury, at the case of Mr. Jim Smith, and at the case of Mr. Clarence Robinson? In the light of the fact that Secretary Weinberger has apologised to the Secretary of State for Defence over the Clarence Robinson episode, should not some statement be made next week? How is the right hon. Gentleman getting on with the Ministry of Defence and the Treasury?

Mr. Biffen: I recollect the Easter Adjournment debate, not least because the hon. Gentleman reminded me specifically to include the Treasury in my consideration.

Mr. Dalyell: Yes.

Mr. Biffen: There, we are at one. I shall look at the matter afresh and be in touch with the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Michael Fallon (Darlington): Can we have an early debate on mortgage tax relief so that every household with a mortgage will be able to understand how expensive a vote for either of the alliance parties would be?

Mr. Biffen: The point which my hon. Friend makes is not only topical but one of growing public interest. The earliest opportunity for the matter to be debated will be in Committee on the Finance Bill.

Mr. David Penhaligon (Truro): May I remind the Leader of the House that, next week, it is six months since the tin crisis started. Is it not appropriate that the House should provide time——

Mr. Brian Sedgemore (Hackney, South and Shoreditch): And money

Mr. Penhaligon: —for the Select Committee report to be discussed? The Government would have the opportunity to defend their total lack of action to date.

Mr. Biffen: I could not accept those astringent and ungenerous remarks. I realise that the tin crisis continues to be a lively concern in the House. I shall draw the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry to the points which have been made this afternoon.

Sir Kenneth Lewis (Stamford and Spalding): Since the Second Reading of the Shops Bill will take place next Monday, will my right hon. Friend consider making it a two-day debate and bring us here on Sunday so that we will know what it will be like when the shops are open?

Mr. Biffen: With a modicum of success, I have resisted the temptation to be an innovative Leader of the House. I certainly have no intention that we should come here on a Sunday to discuss the Shops Bill.

Mr. Harry Ewing (Falkirk, East): Will the Leader of the House arrange for the Secretary of State for Scotland to make a statement on the crisis in Scottish prisons? Is the Leader of the House aware that Scotland has the highest male prisoner population per head of the population in western Europe? Prisoners on remand are being transferred to youth institutions, which is totally unsatisfactory. Prisoners are held and prison officers work in absolutely intolerable conditions. I urge the Leader of the House to urge the Secretary of State for Scotland to make a statement on this crisis.

Mr. Biffen: I will draw the attention of my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland to the points that the hon. Gentleman has made. I realise that the hon. Gentleman feels that it is an important topic.

Mr. Richard Ryder (Mid-Norfolk): In view of the Government's commitment to conserve unique parts of the British landscape, as witnessed by their welcome decision to bring forward the Bill relating to the Broads and the success of the Halvergate grazing scheme, does the Leader of the House agree that this is a suitable moment for a major debate on conservation?

Mr. Biffen: Yes, if there were much more time available than I possess at present.

Mr. Robert Parry (Liverpool, Riverside): Has the Leader of the House noticed the three early-day motions 673, 680 and 700?

[That this House recognises that while the Prime Minister has condemned dictatorships, her Government has invited Chun Du Hwan to visit Britain following the brutal suppression of trade union and civil rights in his country; and accordingly calls for his visit to be cancelled.]

[That this House registers acute concern at the findings of Amnesty International in relation to the incidence of repression, suppression and torture in South Korea, exemplified by the case of Kim Keun-tae who was subjected to persistent police harassment, arbitrary arrest, denial of basic civil and legal rights, detention incommunicado and severe physical beating and abuse; urges the Prime Minister to take the opportunity of the visit to this country of President Chun Doo-Hwan to make strenuous representation of such acute concern, as she has been wont to do publicly in cases of other countries accused of similar or even less severe charges; and further urges her most earnestly to ensure that on the occasion of her reciprocal visit to South Korea next month she insists on meeting opposition representatives, especially Mr. Kim Dae Jung, Mr. Kim Young Sam, Mr. Lee Min Woo and Cardinal Kim Sou Dwan to satisfy herself and this country that they are made fully aware of prevailing circumstances and publicly to express British support for systems of government where opposition can be expressed freely, organised openly and demonstrated without penalty.]

[That this House calls upon the Prime Minister in her meeting with President Chun of South Korea to call for democratic reforms and the restoration of human rights in South Korea, to support Her Majesty's Government's official policy of the peaceful re-unification of the peninsula of Korea and to press for the withdrawal of all foreign troops and nuclear bases on Korean soil.]

The early-day motions deal with the visit of President Chun of South Korea. Will the Leader of the House ask the Prime Minister or the Foreign Secretary to make a statement, next week, from the Dispatch Box, to say whether the matters of human rights and freedoms of trade unions and the peaceful reunification of North and South Korea have been discussed? Unification is the official policy of the Government.

Mr. Biffen: I am sure that the House hopes that the visit of the President of South Korea will result in success from every point of view, not least in the mutual commercial interests that we have. I will certainly draw the attention of my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary to the points that the hon. Gentleman has made.

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg (Hampstead and Highgate): Reverting to the Shops Bill, when my right hon. Friend has his talks through the usual channels, will he do two things? Will he refuse to succumb to the siren voices who believe that two hours extra debate will make the slightest difference, since most minds are already made up?

If my right hon. Friend listens to the advice of my hon. Friend the Member for Stamford and Spalding (Sir K. Lewis) and brings us here on a Sunday, will he arrange to make sure that public transport and public utilities are not working? That is the obvious wish of those who want nothing to be done on Sundays.

Mr. Biffen: I have had quite enough problems with the Shops Bill without trying to fine-tune our experiences on a Sunday. I will leave that to one side. I take account of what my hon. Friend says about the extension of time on Monday. I believe that a number of Members would like the time extended and it is something to be considered through the usual channels.

[Mr. Biffen]

Mr. Ron Brown (Edinburgh, Leith): Will the Leader of the House arrange an early debate on the middle east, bearing in mind the unstable nature of that part of the world and recognising that Mr. Reagan has not helped the position? Indeed, will the Leader of the House understand that all the threats against Libya, for all its faults, can only endanger our citizens who work legitimately for the Libyan Government?

Mr. Biffen: I have told the Leader of the Opposition that I thought we should try to find some agreed time for a foreign affairs debate. While I do not agree with overmuch of what the hon. Gentleman said, I agree that the middle east would be a central feature of such a debate.

Mr. Michael McNair-Wilson (Newbury): In view of the important remark of my right hon. Friend the Member for Chingford (Mr. Tebbit) about the poisonous effect of certain legislation passed during the permissive sixties, does not my right hon. Friend think that the time that we shall use on the unnecessary Shops Bill could be better spent on reforming some of that legislation — for example, the Obscene Publications Act 1964?

Mr. Biffen: If one moves from the generality to the specific proposition, the whole matter becomes rather more contentious. However, my hon. Friend may well have the good fortune to make that point in Monday's debate.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am always reluctant to curtail business questions, but we have an important statement and a heavy day before us. I shall allow a further 10 minutes and then we must move on. If questions are brief, I shall be able to call every hon. Member who has been rising.

Mr. Robert N. Wareing (Liverpool, West Derby): Has the Leader of the House noticed that more than 100 hon. Members from both sides of the House have signed early-day motion 627 congratulating the Disablement Income Group on its 21st anniversary?

[That this House congratulates the Disablement Income Group on achieving 21 years of service to the cause of disabled people; recognises its important role in informing Parliament and the public of the needs of disabled people; and looks forward to the attainment of its objectives, including the provision of a comprehensive national disability income, including a disablement costs allowance, and a society in which disabled people enjoy full equality of opportunity.]

Does he agree that, if he wishes to be associated with that notice, he should respond to that organisation's press release of today calling for an abandonment of the Government's amendments to the Disabled Persons (Services, Consultation and Representation) Bill of my hon. Friend the Member for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke), which is due for debate tomorrow? Does he agree that, in view of the curtailment of the debate on the Social Security Bill next week, the Government should respond by giving Government time to allow my hon. Friend's Bill to go through?

Mr. Biffen: First, the point of substance should be directed to the Minister who has responsibility for handling the Bill from the Government Bench. Secondly, there is a reasonable case to be made for the timetable motion that is being proposed next week. I do not wish there to be any misunderstanding whatever: there is no prospect of Government time being made available for the Disabled Persons (Services, Consultation and Representation) Bill.

Mr. Richard Holt (Langbaurgh): My right hon. Friend will recall that, although I am the Member of Parliament for Middlesbrough, South, I am banned from Middlesbrough council. He may care to bear in mind the disgraceful scenes at Middlesbrough council on Monday night this week when Labour councillors fought physically among themselves. If the Labour party does not have a topic for discussion next week, will my right hon. Friend suggest law and order, so that we could perhaps instil some sense of decency into the so-called leaders in our society?

Mr. Biffen: Those of us who have been students of the Labour party over many years have recognised that there has been a certain fraternal breeziness and occasionally a resort to excessive legalism, but that is a problem for the Leader of the Opposition. However, I shall bear in mind my hon. Friend's thoughtful proposal.

Mr. Eric Deakins (Walthamstow): In view of the constitutional importance of the European Communities (Amendment) Bill which is now before the House, will the Leader of the House assure us that, in accordance with precedent, the Committee and Report stages will be taken on the Floor of the House?

Mr. Biffen: I shall certainly bear the hon. Gentleman's point in mind.

Mr. David Harris (St. Ives): In underlining the pleas already made from both sides of the House for a debate next week or as soon as possible on the tin crisis, can I ask my right hon. Friend to bear in mind the extreme urgency of the position, brought home by laying off workers in the Geevor mine in my constituency and the shadow that that has cast over the whole industry in Cornwall? Is he aware that, if we are not careful, that industry, which has existed for more than 2,000 years, could disappear?

Mr. Biffen: My hon. Friend has conducted his advocacy of the cause of the industry and of his constituency with dignity and effectiveness throughout. I shall be only too happy to refer his remarks to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry.

Dr. John Marek (Wrexham): Does my right hon. Friend agree that the British Railways (Stansted) Bill, upon which debate was adjourned recently, should wait its turn so that other private Bills can be debated on the Floor of the House?

Mr. Biffen: Private legislation does not properly fall within my authority.

Mr. Peter Lilley (St. Albans): Will my right hon. Friend seek to accommodate the excellent suggestion of my hon. Friend the Member for Darlington (Mr. Fallon) that we should attempt to have an early debate on mortgage income tax relief, by persuading the alliance parties to use their time to clarify their policies on the issue? This is increasingly important in view of their attempts to resile from clear statements. The environment spokesman for the Liberal party clearly stated that he would abolish mortgage income tax relief, and there was an equally clear statement by the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Deveonport (Dr. Owen) for the Social Democratic party, in an article in The Times, that he favoured the abolition of mortgage income tax relief. There are some doubts on those Benches, and hon. Members need to clarify their views on the matter.

Mr. Biffen: I am a hardened realist on these matters, and I do not believe there is any prospect of those on the alliance Benches providing a debate in which they have to face reality. That is why we have to use the much less seductive opportunities of the Committee stage of the Finance Bill. I realise that my hon. Friend has particular difficulties in that sense, and I am sorry about that.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Down at Wapping, about 500 people have had to be provided with passes to reach their homes. Murdoch has robbed 5,000 people of their jobs and of the compensation that should have followed. The Government provided Murdoch with taxpayers' money to build fortress Wapping. In view of those facts, why are the Government frightened to have a debate on those and similar issues?

Mr. Biffen: I do not suppose that those who are demonstrating outside the works at Wapping are now, or have been in the past, among the most sensitive members of the community. It seems to me that they have been tough and that they exploited their economic position when they were able to do so. However if the position is really as disastrous as the hon. Gentleman suggests, it is quite clear what we should debate on Monday 21 April.

Mr. John Mark Taylor (Solihull): When my right hon. Friend discusses the Leyland statement with the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, will he seek his reaction to the fact that the JCB offer apparently falls outside the deadline set by the Secretary of State himself? Will he also ask the Secretary of State to clarify the importance of the integrity of Freight Rover within the Land Rover group?

Mr. Biffen: That point has already been raised this afternoon. I will ensure that my right hon. Friend is made aware of my hon. Friend's remarks.

Mr. Dave Nellist (Coventry, South-East): Has the Leader of the House seen early-day motion 699 on Government financial support for conductive education?

[That this House congratulates the BBC documentary team which produced 'Standing up for Joe' transmitted on Tuesday 1st April; is dismayed that the benefits of conductive education, having been recognised in the United Kingdom for over 20 years, have never been seriously studied with the intention of fully introducing them here; notes the signing of the Anglo-Hungarian cultural agreement on 21st March in Budapest which commits both sides to encouraging the conclusion of an agreement on co-operation between Birmingham University and the Teacher Training and Education Institute for the Motor Disabled; calls on the Government urgently to find the necessary £¼ million to ensure the successful start of that project and therefore to match the £200,000 promised by both Birmingham City Council and by Dr. Barnardo's who, along with the Parkinson's Disease Society and others, have already committed themselves to the project's success; and firmly believes that conductive education could bring hope to the thousands of families with children unable to control bodily movements because of damage or disease in the brain or central nervous system, that their children will not be denied the opportunity to learn to master their difficulties, and that conductive education introduced into Britain could emulate the successes of the Budapest clinic where over 70 per cent. of the children completing the course go on to normal state education.]

On 21 March the Government and the Hungarian Government signed a cultural agreement promising close co-operation on the setting up in Birmingham of an institute similar to that in Budapest which teaches brain-damaged children to sit, walk and talk.

Will the right hon. Gentleman arrange for a statement to be made, either during tomorrow's debate on disabled people's rights, or on Monday, on whether or not the Government will find the £250,000 necessary to match the £200,000 that Dr. Barnado's and Birmingham city council have given so that British kids, instead of having to raise money through charity and go to Hungary, can look forward to having their degenerative diseases being properly treated in this country?

Mr. Biffen: I realise that the hon. Gentleman feels that the matter is germane to tomorrow's debate. I will therefore draw it to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East): Is my right hon. Friend aware of the concern in the country about the random selection of potential jurors? Does he not agree that many of those selected have not the intelligence to be members of juries, and do not even acknowledge that prisons deter those who are guilty? They are social misfits, to an extent. They do not believe in punishment. Should there not be a debate next week to consider how jurors are selected?

Mr. Biffen: My hon. Friend's contribution is most interesting. I do not think that I can help him better than by saying that I will, of course, see that his remarks are referred to my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): Instead of curtailing discussion on the Social Security Bill next Tuesday, would it not be better to give that day's debate over to foreign affairs so that hon. Members could raise their concern about the bombing of the Island of Kaho'olawe in Hawaii, referred to in early-day motion 697?

[That this House, aware of the threat posed to the Hawaiian island of Kaho'olawe by bombing and shelling practice in the U.S. Navy's RIMPAC exercise, and aware of appeals by both the Hawaiian State Government and Hawaiian people for the protection of this sacred island with its many valuable historical sites and unique ecology, and knowing that the United States Government does not consider the bombing and shelling of Kaho'olawe to be essential to the RIMPAC exercise, and conscious that Australia, New Zealand and Japan have all refrained from this target practice, calls upon Her Majesty's Government to consider withdrawing our naval forces or at least to instruct the Commander of the British contingent assigned to the RIMPAC exercise during Global '86 to refrain from bombing and shelling Kaho'olawe.]

[Mr. Jeremy Corbyn]

A large number of hon. Members have also signed three early-day motions about central America — 553, 619, and 677. These important matters need to be debated in the House.

[That this House recognises the need to achieve a peaceful solution to the problems of Central America; is aware of the importance of the recently signed Caraballeda Declaration calling on the end to all foreign aid to irregular forces operating in Central America, the progressive elimination of all foreign forces in the region and the reduction of arms acquisitions; is further aware of the repeated calls of the Contadora countries to cease United States funding of the Contras and of the well-documented, appalling human rights violations by the Contras; calls on the United States Congress to reject President Reagan's request for increased aid, including military aid, to the Contras; calls on the United Kingdom Government to join with other European Economic Community countries to oppose publicly the request for military and other aid; and calls on the United States Administration to stop all efforts designed to bring down the Nicaraguan Government and to resume direct bilateral talks with the Nicaraguan Government which have been unilaterally suspended by the United States of America.]

[That this House is alarmed at the recent revelation of activity by the Contras against the democratically elected government of Nicaragua; is appalled that on 25th January 1985 in Waslala, Zelaya, a group of civilian travellers and children were ambushed on their way to meet President Ortega; is horrified that on 29th June 1984, Paco Sivilla, a teacher from Brownback, was hunted by a group of Contras and his ears, tongue and private parts cut off before he was brutally murdered; is shocked that in July 1984 Adám Flores, a 70-year-old man, was murdered by a force of 70 Contras; further believes that these are a few examples of the most appalling murders by Contra forces against the people of Nicaragua; believes that President Reagan's attempts to send a further $100 million in aid to the Contras can only continue the war and result in further murders of the Nicaraguan people; and accordingly demands that Her Majesty's Government put all possible pressure on President Reagan to cease all support for the Contras and respect the territorial integrity and peaceful wishes of the people of Nicaragua.]

[That this House is alarmed that President Reagan is further attempting to send military aid to the Contra forces in their desperate struggle to destroy the democratic government of Nicaragua; congratulates those members of the United States House of Representatives who voted to prevent the granting of $100 million aid and calls upon members of the United States Senate to do likewise; and further calls upon Her Majesty's Government to disassociate itself from United States policy in the region and declare its full recognition of the territorial integrity of Nicaragua.]

Mr. Biffen: Many hon. Members want an early debate on foreign affairs. However, in planning a programme, one must achieve a balance between general debates and specific commitments to legislation which must follow to some extent a pre-determined timetable based on the length of the Session.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): Could my right hon. Friend give a little mild education to the Leader of the Opposition, and put right many campaigning organisations, by reminding them that a three-line Whip is a requirement to attend a debate, not a requirement to vote in a certain way? Members of this party, and probably of the Labour party, will vote according to their consciences. If the Patronage Secretary wants a three-line Whip, the reason may be that colleagues might otherwise be tempted to find more important business elsewhere.

Mr. Biffen: Well, there we are. My hon. Friend reminds me that Lord Hailsham reminded us during the Profumo debate that a three-line Whip was merely a summons to attend. In my experience, if one turns up on a three-line Whip and then goes off to the Tea Room, the Smoking Room or the Television Room, the Whips will not be entirely detached and other-wordly about the situation. The public know perfectly well what three-line Whips mean.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): On five occasions over the past four months I have raised the question of kidnap insurance policies being sold in the City, and the fact that those so insured are at risk. We hear from Ireland that Mrs Jennifer Guinness has been kidnapped. As the Leader of the House cannot comment upon what is happening over there, does he not feel that it is time for a statement to be made at the Dispatch Box telling the House and the country what the Government intend to do to stop such insurance policies from being sold, as they act as an incentive?

Mr. Biffen: I have sat on this Bench and heard exchanges between the hon. Gentleman and my hon. Friends—

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Five times, and no action.

Mr. Biffen: I did not necessarily hear five exchanges, but I can well believe it; it seemed like 50. I recollect that the hon. Gentleman was invited to produce further evidence.

Local Government Finance

4.8 pm

The Minister for the Environment, Countryside and Local Government (Mr. William Waldegrave): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I shall make a statement about a complex technical matter to do with the operation of the block grant system established by the Local Government, Planning and Land Act 1980. I hope that the House will bear with me.

Generally, block grant is paid to compensate authorities for differences in their expenditure needs and in their rateable resources. But, in addition, subsection (6)(a) of section 59 of the 1980 Act gives the Secretary of State a power to determine block grant multipliers to limit changes in the grant entitlements of individual authorities from year to year. In every year since 1981 my right hon. Friend and his predecessors have used this power to set safety nets to protect local authorities against undesirable losses in any one settlement. In two years it has also been used to set caps on increases, to prevent undesirable gains by some authorities at the expense of all other authorities.

Each year since 1981 my right hon. Friend and his predecessors have used the power to safety net grant losses arising from particular features of successive settlements. In 1981-82 a cap was also applied to grant gains resulting from the introduction of the new grant system.

As far as 1986-87 is concerned, my right hon. Friend the then Secretary of State made it clear in his provisional announcement to the House in July last year that he proposed to use these powers to restrict windfall gains resulting from the decision to dispense with expenditure targets. We also stated on many occasions our intention that the grant effects of abolishing the GLC and the metropolitan county councils should be neutral at ratepayer level. We gave effect to these intentions in the multipliers set out in the RSG Report which the House approved in January.

Thus, in each year since 1981 the Secretary of State interpreted the powers in subsection (6)(a) of section 59 of the 1980 Act in such a way as to limit certain factors affecting grant entitlements, but not others. For example, we have made changes to the way grant-related expenditure assessments are calculated — often as a result of representations made by local government. In every year, successive Secretaries of State have proposed that the effect of these changes should be mitigated by the setting of safety nets. What we have never sought or agreed to do is to protect authorities from the grant effects of their own expenditure decisions. It would have run counter to one central purpose of Government policy in this area to do so.

This approach had the general support of the local authority associations. It has been embodied in the RSG reports for each of the six years 1981-82 to 1986-87, all of which have been approved by this House. It has not previously been challenged.

However, this year for the first time a handful of authorities have questioned whether subsection (6)(a) of section 59 can be used to achieve the objective I have just described. They maintain that the Secretary of State's power is restricted to limiting changes in the overall amount of grant payable to an authority for one year compared with the previous year. One authority has already taken court action on this, and I understand that a number of other authorities are considering similar action.

I must make it clear that I do not believe that the powers could be used in any sensible, praticable fashion under this alternative interpretation. For example, it would require the Secretary of State to include within any safety net the effect of grant reductions arising solely because authorities' own rateable resources had increased. It would also require the Secretary of State to take account of grant which authorities had lost solely as a result of their own expenditure decisions. That would be nonsense. No reasonable authority would expect the Secretary of State to operate the powers in this way.

Such an interpretation would cast doubt on the grant entitlement for every local authority for 1986-87 and for every previous year back to 1981-82, under the RSG settlements which the House has approved. It would clearly be most unsatisfactory if a procedure which has been followed since 1981-82 were to be overturned, particularly since throughout this period there has been a broad measure of agreement on what the subsection meant between the Department and the local authority associations, many of whose members would face wholly unmanageable losses of grant if any other interpretation of the 1980 Act were to become accepted. The Government are not prepared to allow that to happen and believe that we must take action to preserve the status quo.

Obviously the position must be clarified. The Government will therefore be bringing forward a short Bill during this Session of Parliament to remove any doubts about the interpretation of the Secretary of State's powers in relation to multipliers for past years and for the future.

4.12 pm

Mr. Jack Straw (Blackburn): In the light of the news on the tapes earlier today that the Conservative spokesmen in Fulham were complaining that voting by Conservatives has been slow, the Opposition were wondering what secret weapon the Government would use to encourage voters to the polls. With this statement on block grant multipliers, we know what the secret weapon will be. The voters will be electrified and galvanised into voting, especially as Hammersmith and Fulham, which is controlled by Conservative and alliance councillors, has a multiplier of 0·701790, which the voters know means that they have been given extra grant by the Government.

Is the Minister aware that, behind the sheer farce to which successive Conservative Secretaries of State have reduced the system of rate support grant and behind the smokescreen of technicality which the Minister tried to raise today, his statement raises a serious constitutional issue — a bare-faced attempt by the Government to interfere with the judicial process? By this one-clause Bill Ministers propose to use their majority in the House to pre-empt decisions of the courts.

The Minister said that one authority had already begun court action. Will he confirm that the authority involved is Birmingham city council and that the use of the past tense in his statement in relation to the city council is wholly misleading, since Birmingham's case against the Secretary of State for the Environment is set down for a three-day oral hearing next Tuesday? Since the Government propose, whatever decision the courts may make, to overturn that decision retrospectively, will the Department of the Environment seek to defend that action in the Divisional Court next Tuesday? How much is at stake for Birmingham city council and its ratepayers?

[Mr. Jack Straw]

Occasionally, legislation has been introduced in the House retrospectively to change decisions of courts, for example, with the War Damage Act 1965 and the more recent decision by the Government to overturn the defeat that they suffered at the hands of the Greater London council over London Regional Transport. Can the Minister name one occasion on which a previous Government have introduced or announced the introduction of legislation during the pursuit of a case in the courts?

The Minister said that the approach which the Government had previously adopted has the general support of local authority associations and that there is a, "broad measure of agreement . . . between the Department and the local authority associations."

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): That is a pack of lies.

Mr. Straw: My hon. Friend, from a sedentary position, says that that is a pack of lies, but you will not have heard that, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Skinner: I will stand up and say it. It is a lie.

Mr. Straw: Does the Minister accept that this is grossly misleading and that the Association of County Councils has received legal advice in similar terms to that given to Birmingham city council and is supporting Birmingham city council's action and that the Association of Metropolitan Authorities has submitted affidavits in support of Birmingham's position? Which local authority associations have expressed general support for the Government's approach?

The Minister claimed that the purpose of using multipliers was to introduce neutrality into the system, especially in relation to the abolition of the metropolitan county councils. Could he explain why the rates in the metropolitan councils have shot up by such vast amounts, for example, by 27 per cent. in West Yorkshire, when expenditure has increased by a tiny amount? Could he also explain why the Conservative-controlled district council of Gillingham in Kent has received so much rate support grant this year that it has not levied a rate at all? Not a single penny has been levied in Gillingham, despite a 25 per cent. increase in expenditure. Is that what the Minister means by "neutrality" when he talks of using these multipliers?

Will the Minister confirm that he failed to say in his statement that the one-clause Bill would have to be retrospective in effect to 1980? What does he think of the view of the former Secretary of State for the Environment —the right hon. Member for Wanstead and Woodford (Mr. Jenkin)—who said in the House in 1965:

"Retrospective legislation is a damned slippery slope. Let the House dig its heels in and say that it will have no more of it." —[Official Report, 2 March 1965; Vol. 707, c. 1264.]

Will the Minister confirm that this panic statement was rushed out only because the Department of the Environment has been advised that it will lose in court next week? It has been advised that it has been acting illegally for the past six years and it wishes to cover that up with a simple abuse of power. Is the Conservative view of freedom under the law the freedom to change the law whenever the Government expect defeat in the courts?

Mr. Waldegrave: The hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) is good at getting into a rage, but this is not a good opportunity to do so. The case that is coming to court next week is the Birmingham city council case——

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): Will the Government defend it?

Mr. Waldegrave: As to the handling of that case, consultations continue and we have not yet decided.

The hon. Member for Blackburn spoke about retrospection and was somewhat unwise to introduce an example of disgraceful retrospection—the War Damage Act 1965, which changed people's rights retrospectively. Our proposition would maintain the status quo. If, over the years, the hon. Gentleman, who is a sharp Member of the House, had noticed that the powers were in doubt, he would have drawn our attention to the matter, but he worked under this framework, as did all the local authority associations. All the representations that have been made to us — for example, by the Association of London Authorities — were made on the assumption that the powers meant what everyone thought they meant. There have been plenty of occasions when the House has acted to clarify the law and confirm people's understanding of it, for example, in many Finance Acts, as the hon. Gentleman pointed out in debates on the Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act 1984. No authority will gain or lose money from the change that we shall make. They will all have the position, as they thought it to be, confirmed.

The hon. Gentleman introduced the subject of west Yorkshire. Rates are going up much too far in the successor councils in the west Yorkshire area, largely because the outgoing metropolitan council suppressed the rate last year to make an artificial increase this year. That was not very clever but it was trying to make a political point. In bringing forward this measure we shall simply be maintaining the status quo as all the practitioners in the field thought it to be.

Mr. Patrick Jenkin (Wanstead and Woodford): Is not the distinction a perfectly clear one—that it is perfectly legitimate to legislate in this way in order to implement settled expectations and it is unacceptable to legislate retrospectively to defeat settled expectations, as the Labour Government did under the War Damage Act 1965?

Mr. Waldegrave: My right hon. Friend is right. The hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) rather shot himself in the foot by introducing the example of the War Damage Act 1965.

Mr. John Cartwright (Woolwich): Is the Minister aware that his statement today will confirm the widely held view that these famous multipliers are simply a sophisticated means of ensuring that the Government grant is shared out in whatever way suits the whims of the present occupier of the Secretary of State's office? How can he go on complaining, as he does, about the spending record of local government when he now accepts that there is such doubt about the legality of the block grant distribution that he is forced to come to the House of Commons to change the law after six years' operation?

Mr. Waldegrave: I agree that the workings of the block grant system are now far too complicated to be maintained into the future, but I challenge the hon. Gentleman or anyone else to come up with any proposals for reform other than those of my right hon. Friend who started the process whose results we now put before the House. We have proposals for simplification and I sympathise with the hon. Gentleman's desire to see those brought forward.

Mrs. Edwina Currie (Derbyshire, South): Does my hon. Friend agree that court action is threatened not only by Birmingham council, of which I am still a city councillor, but by other Labour-controlled local authorities, and will he join me in congratulating those Labour-controlled local authorities on their new-found respect for so-called Tory judges and their determination to abide by a court order if they can get it? Will he further agree that the current state of the law is intolerable and that without legislation all we shall have will be a muddle and the fiddling around of grants going back to 1981? His action is wise, necessary and will be welcome.

Mr. Waldegrave: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. She is right. I do not believe that the hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) is serious in opposing the legislation. There will be just as many Labour losers as Conservative losers. It would be almost impossible to predict who would be the losers if the system had to be re-done back to 1981. I do not think that is what he wants. He is entitled to have his day of teasing me across the Dispatch Box, as he is good at doing, but the serious matter here is, as my hon. Friend says, that it must be a matter of good administration to clarify the law in this area.

Ms. Clare Short (Birmingham, Ladywood): Is not the truth of the matter that Birmingham has discovered that the Government are cheating us out of a considerable sum of money and, having been found out, the Government are changing the law and that is outrageous? How much money is at stake? The Government are entitled to change the law for the future and to make whatever settlements should be made about the misapplication of the law in the past, but to move in quickly and change the law before the case comes to court is an outrageous way to proceed. How much is Birmingham losing by this action?

Mr. Waldegrave: The trouble is that the hon. Lady is wrong. If it were to be proven that Birmingham's interpretation was right, Birmingham's starting position this year would be different, and for the year before, and for the year before, and for the year before that. So goodness knows whether Birmingham would gain or lose in the end.

Sir Dudley Smith (Warwick and Leamington): I appreciate the difficult and intricate nature of the block grant multipliers, but does not the situation underline yet again the need for a full reorganisation of local government finance and the raising of rates? Does my hon. Friend agree that the sooner we move to that, the sooner we shall get away from this position?

Mr. Waldegrave: I wholeheartedly agree with my hon. Friend.

Mr. Robin Corbett (Birmingham, Erdington): Is not the fact of the matter in plain English that the Government have been advised that they are fiddling the books and to that extent they have been caught with their fingers in the till? Is it not the case that, as a result of the decision, Birmingham is set to lose about £7 million? Will the Minister repeat from the Dispatch Box that the effect of abolition on ratepayers should be neutral and then acknowledge Birmingham's case that abolition is costing city ratepayers money?

Mr. Waldegrave: That is good rhetoric but poor logic. If the hon. Gentleman considers the matter a little further, he will find that neither he nor I nor anybody else can predict what the final outcome will be for Birmingham because there will be complete uncertainty about starting points over the past four years. A large number of other authorities would lose and I have no doubt that many would write to the hon. Gentleman and object and then he would be in some difficulty.

Mr. John Townend (Bridlington): Does my hon. Friend agree that the working of the multiplier this year in some areas has produced nonsense? Does he further agree that there is a feeling of unfairness among many small district councils in east Yorkshire, which, having done everything that the Government have asked and kept spending down—not only last year but, in the case of Holderness in my constituency, for nearly 10 years—have lost grant? Do I take it that what he said today will do nothing to remove the injustice that those councils have suffered this year?

Mr. Waldegrave: I am aware that several of my hon. Friends are unhappy with the rate support grant settlement this year, but I regret that they cannot look to the proposed Bill to give them any relief. We shall be confirming the RSG settlement this year as it stands.

Mr. Skinner: Is not the real scandal that the Government—a Government who believe in law and order—have now been found out by Birmingham and are intent on being cruel and vindictive to the people of Birmingham, and, who knows, many others who might follow in their wake, which sought to improve its balances by several million pounds in order to provide services for the old and disabled? The Government, who do not care, are so hell bent on stopping that that they are not even prepared to allow the law courts to proceed in order to find a settlement. Retrospective legislation — the Minister ought to be ashamed of himself.

Mr. Waldegrave: Even the hon. Gentleman's unequalled capacity to discover outrage under every stone has been over-tested in this matter. It is not such an exciting matter as he hopes.

Mr. John Watts (Slough): Does my hon. Friend agree that, despite the ritual protests about retrospection from the Opposition Benches, the vast majority of sensible authorities will be relieved to have the protection that he is proposing against the retrospective overturning of a settlement going back as far as 1981? Will my hon. Friend take steps to ensure that all local authorities are made fully aware of the consequences of the course of action urged from the Opposition Front Bench which would turn local government finance into chaos for six years back?

Mr. Waldegrave: That is exactly what, as I understand it, the Opposition are proposing. I have more respect for the hon. Member for Blackburn than to think that he is seriously proposing that. There would be a tremendous caterwauling from all the losers if the other interpretation were to succeed. I have no doubt that we would then be urged to bring some clarity and certainty into the situation.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): Is not the synthetic and bogus hysteria which the hon. Member for

[Mr. Tony Marlow]

Blackburn (Mr. Straw) tried to generate unsuccessfully in his remarks somewhat sad? Is not the reality that if the hon. Gentleman were sitting in the place of my hon. Friend the Minister he would have attempted to make exactly the same statement, if not with the same force, clarity and eloquence?

Mr. Waldegrave: Conservative Members need no lectures, certainly not from the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner), about retrospective legislation, since I believe that he is keen on retrospective legislation for a number of cases. Unfortunately, this is not retrospective legislation of the kind that he likes. As has been said, this confirms people's expectations about what the situation is and was and does not change them.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East): While settlements will be re-established by the new Bill, does not my hon. Friend agree that it will be irresponsible of any of the other local authorities now to consider any further kind of legal action against the Government? Will he also confirm that in the past four or five years the local authority associations have gained quite a lot under the old system? Lastly, will he look again at the multiplier for Leicester to consider whether a reduced amount could be given to Leicester because, of course, it has overspent for so long?

Mr. Waldegrave: My hon. Friend never misses an opportunity to have a crack at the villains who run Leicester, and I congratulate him on taking yet another opportunity to get the political villains, as he would see them. The fact of the matter is that this legislation, rather less exciting than had been hoped for by the Opposition, simply confirms the situation as we have all believed it to be.

Orders of the Day

Airports Bill

Order for Third Reading read.

4.30 pm

The Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Nicholas Ridley): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

We had the debate on the Eyre report at the beginning of last year and on the White Paper in June last year, and then we had Second Reading of the Bill followed by a full Committee stage but without a guillotine or timetable motion, and a very full day yesterday on Report, as I am sure hon. Members will agree. I think that nobody can say that the policy has not been subjected to major and continuing parliamentary scrutiny and voting.

The main actors in this long drama have had very full speaking parts. There were those who come from areas where airports are a matter of burning political controversy, including my hon. Friends the Members for Saffron Walden (Mr. Haselhurst), for Harlow (Mr. Hayes), for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Wells), in the Stansted area, and the right hon. Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe (Mr. Morris), my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Withington (Mr. Silvester), the hon. Member for Stretford (Mr. Lloyd) and many others from the north-west who have been firm advocates of the interests of Manchester airport. We have also had represented the interests of the airlines and those who are passionately concerned in their affairs. My hon. Friends the Members for South Hams (Mr. Steen), for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker), for Ruislip-Northwood (Mr. Wilkinson) and for Hayes and Harlington (Mr. Dicks) have all played a full part in the drama.

These varying interests have come and weaved together and split apart, appeared in various costumes and disguises, passed through sinister phases of wetness and dryness, and they have been the main actors, but there have also been minor characters who have merely sat around the stage, listened and waited — the hon. Members for Aberdeen, North (Mr. Hughes) and for West Bromwich, East (Mr. Snape), my hon. Friend the Minister of State with responsibility for aviation, my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Scotland and myself — who have merely been attendants of this great drama. I pay tribute to them all — except perhaps myself — for their steadfastness under fire, for their skill in debate, repeating arguments, if I may say so, over and over again with ever-increasing skill and conviction and for their ability to stay up late at night.

We come now to the epilogue. The Bill is almost identical to the proposals set out in the White Paper of June 1985. It has been improved in detail in debate and tested in the Lobbies — both the Division Lobbies and the commercial lobbies — but it has emerged virtually unscathed. Perhaps I may be forgiven for saying, almost sotto voce, that we got it right at the beginning.

One of the main concerns in the debates has been the effects on local authority airports of privatising the British Airports Authority as a whole. Hon. Members on both sides of the House have claimed that we are seeking to privatise a monopoly which would be able to crush the development of other airports, notably Manchester. Hon. Members accepted the logic in aviation terms of keeping the BAA's Scottish airports in common ownership and operating them as a system. I believe that the same logic applies even more forcefully to the BAA's south-east airports. If Heathrow is to remain the world's leading international airport, which we all hope it will, while continuing to serve the needs of smaller domestic operators, and if Gatwick is to develop as a European hub, we need to maintain the south-east airports as a system with co-ordinated development and operations.

The question we have debated is whether the new owners of BAA will be able to use their power to take unfair advantage of competitors and to price them out of the market. Under the Bill, we have ensured that they cannot. The Bill spells out in detail the range of regulatory measures available to the Civil Aviation Authority which will enable it to prevent unfair competition between airports. I believe that whatever happens in the London system will make little or no difference to what happens in the north-west, and vice versa.

Nevertheless, the Bill incorporates protection against predatory pricing that could harm another airport's business. With the amendments that we introduced on Report, that protection has been strengthened to give a firmer reassurance still that such competition as there is between airports in different parts of the United Kingdom will be open and, above all, fair. Manchester airport, in particular, will have no grounds to fear unfair competition from a privatised BAA, and most certainly it has no need to fear that predatory pricing at Stansted will harm its business. If a complaint about predatory pricing is made to the CAA, it will judge pricing policies at Stansted as if it were a free-standing airport. I believe that we have the best of both worlds. The United Kingdom will keep the economic and aviation benefits of a strong south-east airport system. The regulatory mechanisms in the Bill will ensure that that strength is not used to the detriment of sound airport development in other parts of the United Kingdom but is targeted towards beating our European competitors who are always trying to muscle in on our business.

I am sure that the privatisation of the BAA will bring very real benefits for the airline industry and its customers. There will be greater freedom for management — for instance, access to private capital—and private sector operation, combined with the regulatory system which we are proposing, will encourage more innovative management and lead to efficiency gains and greater responsiveness to customers.

These are not the only benefits. Privatisation will also further our objective of creating wider share ownership. This will be an important factor in the arrangements for the flotation. Employees will be encouraged to take a stake in their own future by purchasing shares in their company. The details of the employee share scheme are still being discussed, but I would expect it to offer benefits on a similar scale to those offered to British Telecom employees—£70 worth of free shares per employee; two free shares for each one bought, up to a total of £200 worth of free shares; and a 10 per cent. discount on up to £2,000 worth of shares—as well as priority rights of application for full price shares. Together with ongoing schemes, to be introduced by the company, this will encourage employees to participate directly in their company's future profitability.

Major local authority airports will also benefit from the Bill. They are, in most cases, substantial and successful businesses, and the Bill will ensure that they can be operated as such. They will be free to seek services from whoever offers the best deal rather than being locked in to services provided by local authorities. Their management will be able to operate with far more commercial freedom and be less subject to the whims of local vested political interests.

Local authority airports, such as Manchester, East Midlands and Bristol, have a record of rapid expansion in recent years. They have capacity for further expansion and we have undertaken to continue to encourage further development in response to demand. We believe that the opportunites offered by the Bill, including the opportunities—I stress "opportunities", for we intend to encourage, not compel—for involving the private sector in the management of these airports, in the provision of capital for their development and in their ownership, if the present owners wish to take those opportunities, will stimulate and encourage that expansion. That can only be to the benefit of the localities and the regions concerned.

In contrast with this attractive and exciting prospect, the Opposition have typically sought to preserve the status quo. That would not help regional airports, any more than the Opposition helped them when they were in office. We have massively increased the capital allocations for regional airports, and, by liberalising aviation markets, we have produced a very large increase in flights from regional airports. The Bill lays the foundations for their continued future business development and success.

As the airline industry grows, airport capacity will be increasingly under strain. The fallback powers in part III are needed to ensure the balanced development of the finite airport resources we have and to provide effective means of dealing with problems that may arise at congested airports.

The White Paper drew up the agenda for air traffic regulation at airports. The major need at present is for traffic distribution policies for the London airports system. In accordance with that White Paper commitment, we have sought the advice of the Civil Aviation Authority, which in turn has consulted widely—some 322 separate bodies—on a variety of options. The authority is now in the second phase of consultation, having invited scrutiny of its draft conclusions and recommendations. The CAA's draft advice has naturally generated some strong feelings. It would not be right for me to comment upon them now. This is only draft advice. It would be quite wrong for me to comment on a draft report which may yet be materially changed in the light of comments, suggestions and recommendations received from consultees. The Government have no intentions of prejudging the authority's judgment by taking a premature view.

Let me re-emphasise our overweening undertaking that traffic distribution rules will be introduced only if and when and where they are clearly needed. We are in favour of solutions emerging naturally wherever that is possible. We shall continue to encourage solutions of the industry's own making, and we shall not—it has never been our intention—frame the traffic distribution rule powers in such a way as to force an airline to serve a particular airport.

The reserve powers in part III of the Bill extend the duties of the CAA. The authority is charged with advising the Government on traffic distribution rules, air traffic movement limits and slot allocation schemes, and it would also be for the CAA, following a direction under clause 30, to prepare a slot allocation scheme if one were needed. It is appropriate, therefore, that the CAA should operate under special objectives and guidelines in undertaking its functions under clauses 28, 29 and 30. Clause 31 is designed to create those guidelines.

Although clause 31 has not attracted the same attention as some of its near neighbours in this part of the Bill, it is none the less pivotal in creating the framework within which the CAA will be able to offer balanced advice. Clause 31 requires the CAA, in giving advice to the Secretary of State on traffic distribution rules, ATM limits and slot allocation schemes, and, in preparing such schemes where the authority has been so directed, to take account of and to have regard to a number of very important matters. These are the international obligations of the United Kingdom which the Government notify to the CAA under clause 31; the Government's advice on international relations considerations; the need to secure the sound development of civil aviation in the United Kingdom; the interests of users of air transport services; and policy considerations notified to the authority by the Government.

I should hope that our broad purpose in framing those matters, which are to be taken into account, is clear: to protect our international interests—remembering always that the bulk of the United Kingdom civil aviation industry operates in the international dimension—and to secure the right deal for our civil aviation industries and their customers. I would ask the House to bear in mind, too, the policy considerations which we set out to the CAA in asking it to undertake its current review of traffic distribution in the London area.

These were to make efficient use of existing and planned airport facilities and available air space; to enable air services to be operated where they best meet the needs of the travelling public; to support the objective of increasing competition between airlines, in the interests of users; to ensure satisfactory access to Heathrow and Gatwick for domestic services; to maintain London's position as a major international centre, and within that to maintain Heathrow as London's main scheduled service airport while continuing to develop Gatwick as an effective second hub; and to avoid undue dislocation to the airlines using London's airports.

I think that the House may find in these objectives an important earnest of the manner of policy considerations which may be appropriate in the context of clause 31 and which may therefore condition the advice which the CAA offers.

Part IV of the Bill has also aroused a good deal of interest. We have made clear the details of the new regulatory regime on the face of the Bill, so that everyone —the CAA as regulator, airport operators, airlines and passengers—knows exactly where he stands. The Bill makes clear the types of anti-competitive and monopolistic practice that will not be tolerated, and it gives the CAA sufficient powers not only to stamp out such practices but to provide appropriate remedies for anyone who has suffered from them.

The Bill provides the statutory underpinning for the future of our airports policy. It provides powers for the Government to fulfil their strategic responsibilities towards one of our major national resources; it provides the opportunities for airports to reap the benefits of a commercial and businesslike approach to airport management; and, not least, it provides strong and continuing protection against monopoly abuse for the airlines and passengers our airports serve. The Bill will ensure that the United Kingdom's airport industry continues to be the envy of the world.

In reinforcement of what I said at the beginning of my speech—that perhaps we have got it right—this is the first time that I have made a speech on airports policy when no right hon. or hon. Gentleman has sought to interrupt me.

I commend the Bill to the House.

4.46 pm

Mr. Robert Hughes (Aberdeen, North): I join the Secretary of State in paying tribute to those right hon. and hon. Members who have taken part in our numerous debates both in Committee and on Report. The discussions have been detailed and sometimes very hard hitting, but they have always been good natured. I think that we all enjoyed the Committee stage, especially when we learnt about the personal hygiene habits of the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, the hon. Member for Worcestershire, South (Mr. Spicer), who told us about the frequency of his baths. But that enjoyment paled into insignificance because of the Opposition's disappointment that in Committee no major concession was made by the Government. We were also unable in Committee to inflict any major defeat on the Government. However, last night the Whips were very worried when, at about 11 o'clock, it looked as though the Government were facing their first defeat on the Floor of the House since they came to power in 1979.

When the Second Reading vote took place, Government Back Benchers went into the "Aye" Lobby with varying degrees of support, ranging from qualified enthusiasm to downright scepticism and extreme scepticism about the effects of the Bill. Since then the doubting Thomases have multiplied—so much so that the sceptics on the Government Back Benches are now in the majority. I do not know how they will be able to steel and brace themselves to go into the Lobby and vote for the Third Reading. They know as well as I and as well as the Secretary of State that the Bill's contents fail to match up either to the Secretary of State's rhetoric about the virtues of private ownership or to any kind of rational airports policy operating in the national interest.

Part I sets out the manner in which the British Airports Authority is to be sold off to the private sector. In so far as the British Airports Authority's seven airports are to be kept together as a system of airports, I welcome the fact that they are to be held together in a holding company. It makes sense to keep them together, whatever the ownership of the BAA may be and however much we may disagree about its ownership.

Part I is insufficient to promote a coherent airports policy. No one is surprised at that because we know quite well that the Government have no airports policy. Part II sets out the first stage of what the Government intend to be the privatisation of local authority owned airports. It will compel airports in the local authority sector to become Companies Act companies if they qualify with an annual turnover of more than £1 million.

In so far as there is any relationship between parts I and II of the Bill, the Government are forced to fall back on mouthing the empty phrase that they are to stimulate efficiency and competition. Even this Secretary of State very occasionally faces reality. The result of facing reality is that parts III and IV set out controls over competition policy. The Secretary of State has direct control of traffic distribution rules. He has the power to limit aircraft movements at certain airports, to direct the Civil Aviation Authority to prepare schemes for allocating capacity at airports and to subject the airports to economic regulation. He may control landing charges. Then there are the duties of the Civil Aviation Authority, and the references to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission. These add up to a truly labyrinthine system of checks, balances and controls.

I wonder who drafted the Bill. Did the Secretary of State himself supervise the drafting of parts I and II, then go off on holiday and discover on his return that the whole thing had been tampered with and that his political philosophy had been distorted, either by his hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary or by his civil servants who had even more sense? Whoever it was, the fact is that the Bill will prevent competition.

However much the Secretary of State argues that his regulatory powers will be applied in what his hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary always refers to as a "de minimis" fashion, it is also true that the construction of the Bill will affect the sale price. At this stage in the Bill's progress we have the right to know what price the Government expect to receive for the sale of the British Airports Authority. Throughout the proceedings we have asked the Government to come clean and tell us what they expect to get but they have refused to give us even an inkling of the expected sale price. This reticence may be compared to the total retreat of a tortoise into its shell.

The Minister must now tell us what the price is likely to be. It is a matter not of principle but of practice, because I am sure that the House would not wish to give the Bill a Third Reading if the BAA were to be sold for a fraction of its true value. I doubt that even the driest Tory Member would find it easy to agree with such a profligate treatment of public assets. The Minister must give a direct answer about what price he expects to get.

Mr. Ridley: Since the hon. Gentleman asks that question in order that he can compare the figure with what he thinks the authority is worth, would he now tell us what he thinks we ought to get for it?

Mr. Robert Hughes: I have been trying to find out what the price might be. I read carefully the report prepared by Kitcat and Aitken which examined all aspects and policies of the BAA and what it might fetch. Although it has been slightly revised since that stage—November or December 1985—the report concluded that it was impossible to assess the figure. It is a different matter, however, for the Secretary of State. If he has embarked on this exercise without having considered what the sale price might be and with no expectation of what he might get, such action amounts to dereliction of duty. The Secretary of State will not admit to that.

The fact is that estimates vary. The lowest figure that I have seen or heard is £400 million. Some estimates suggest between £500 million and £600 million. One estimate, which I am sure is wildly inaccurate, is that the Government might get as much as £1 billion for the authority. As in all such matters, the truth probably lies between the two extremes. We must ask what the Secretary of State wants. We must match his expectations with the actual figure if the sale goes ahead. I am not convinced that it is such a good proposition. I think that when he comes to float BAA he will not find as many willing buyers as he supposes.

I have two points to make about part II of the Bill, in relation to local authority airports. The first is a passing reference to the exchanges today and yesterday about the issue of hybridity, raised by my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe (Mr. Morris). I am not challenging Mr. Speaker's ruling, but the issue that was raised is that the question of hybridity is not a clear-cut one. We ought to encourage the request of my right hon. Friend the Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore) that the matter should go to the Select Committee on Procedure, so that it may examine the question of hybridity. I hope that the Government will want to follow that course.

The second issue is the manner in which local authority airports are being treated. The Bill compels airports with an annual turnover of £1 million or more to become Companies Act companies. Clauses 20 and 21 make it clear that any capital raised by a local authority by way of a loan from any source, or capital raised from the sale of equity shareholding, will count as prescribed expenditure under the Government's control of local authorities for as long as the majority ownership rests with the local authority or a consortium of local authorities. That will directly affect the ability of these airports to compete on fair terms with the BAA airports.

This distortion of competition is yet another facet of the Government's failure to have a national airports policy. I go further and say that it is yet another facet of the Government's pathological distrust and dislike of local government. That is bad enough, but the real intention is to compel local authorities to divest themselves of their majority shareholding and to abandon their own policy of objectives, in order to follow his own. The Secretary of State is using extortion and blackmail to impose his will on democratically elected bodies which have successfully provided airport services for the benefit of their own areas and for that of the nation. He appeared in his speech to accept that local authority airports have, by and large, been successful. Many have been a success even by the Secretary of State's standards of commercial interest. What he seeks to do here is quite disgraceful. The Secretary of State should be ashamed of himself.

I do not know whether the right hon. Gentleman is leaving the Chamber. He advised me earlier that he might have to leave while was speaking, so I am grateful that he warned me. I see that he is staying. I am even more grateful. In setting out his objectives which have been written into the Bill, the Secretary of State told us that the Bill was part of an overall design to further share ownership by employees and the public at large. We know that the Secretary of State puts that forward with his tongue in his cheek, because he spends all his spare time debunking the currently fashionable Tory idea of "caring capitalism".

Everyone is entitled to his own opinions, but no one is entitled to his own facts. I commend that to the Secretary of State because his opinions are not borne out by the facts. Perhaps I can give a brief example of the way in which his objectives, however much he believes in them, do not match up to the facts. When British Aerospace was floated, the total number of shareholders was 157,829. Twelve months later the total number had gone down dramatically to 27,175. Of the total flotation, 44,000 shareholders held fewer than 100 shares. One year later only 3,279 held fewer than 100 shares.

Mr. Terry Dicks (Hayes and Harlington): Such figures are useless unless we know why they have changed and why people bought or sold shares. Just to give such figures is meaningless.

Mr. Hughes: The figures are not meaningless. The point I am demonstrating is that the aim of having wider share ownership has not been met because the number of people who bought shares and who have held on to them has reduced dramatically. At the time of the flotation there was only one shareholder who held over 1 million shares; 12 months later 13 shareholders held over 1 million shares. Clearly shareholding has become concentrated in fewer and fewer hands and in bigger and bigger holdings. That is the reality of privatisation. The theory of a wider share-owning public is bunkum in practice. People have sold their shares at a profit because the Government have never got the sale price right in any of the privatisation sales. They have always sold at well below a reasonable price which the market could bear. Immediately after the sale the shares jumped in price and people sold to take a quick profit. If that is what the Secretary of State wants, that is up to him. But he should not pretend that the objective of a wider share-owning public has been met, because obviously it has not.

The Bill will do nothing for the balanced development of BAA airports or of local authority airports, or of the combined airports system. It will do nothing to encourage better facilities at airports or traffic growth. If its effects were to be as neutral as I have described, perhaps we could dismiss the Bill as being irrelevant, redundant and of no account; we could say that it is another piece of legislation that is cluttering up the statute book. But it is much worse. The Bill will have harmful effects on airports policy and on customer services. It is no accident that it will damage the wellbeing of employees of the BAA and of local authority airports alike.

We believe in encouraging municipal enterprise. The proper place for a national transport infrastructure is within the public sector. That is where the airports should be. If the Bill has any merit—I have not so far found any real merit in it—its construction will allow us to apply our transport policy for aviation and airports quickly and efficiently when we become the Government. However speedily we return to Government, even that is not enough to persuade me or my colleagues that the Third Reading should not be opposed. Therefore, I invite my right hon. and hon. Friends to join me in the Lobby tonight in voting against the Bill.

5.2 pm

Mr. James Hill (Southampton, Test): I shall not keep the House very long because this is a short debate. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has made it clear in his opening address that the Bill is balanced. All the vicissitudes of the commercial market have been covered. When the Government are selling off a monopoly, there has to be a serious braking system on any excesses by that monopoly. Anyone who has been involved in aviation or who has been employed at an airport will realise that that is one of the most monopolistic areas of commerce.

So far the debate has been brought down by the Opposition spokesman to a question of how much we shall get for the airports. In every debate about turning a public holding over to a private company that issue comes up. The system of the market place is that at the beginning many people invest in an institution because they are told that they will make a profit; that applies to the employees of whatever institution is involved. That is human nature. Again it is human nature that if one is a little hard-pressed, as many people may be after some time, they will try to divest themselves of their shares at the profit-taking time.

I agree that we cannot float a public sector company and expect to have 3 million individual shareholders for ever. That is not the point. Conservative Government policy is that shareowning should become more widespread. There is no reason why the 3 million shareholders in, say, British Telecom should not have taken their profit. Although they may have gone out of one company, they may well be enticed into another company such as British Airways or the British Airports Authority.

Mr. Michael Meadowcroft (Leeds, West): Will the hon. Gentleman take on board the other point that in many cases municipal airports have suffered great debts which have been borne by the ratepayers but if those airports become profitable the local authorities will get no recompense for the public money which they have to put in? Therefore, the gain will go to those who have speculated accurately with their own money. They, not the local authority, will get the bargain.

Mr. Hill: I do not think there is anything in the Bill to prevent those ratepayers buying shares in the BAA public sector company.

The position in Southampton is different. The airfield, Eastleigh, which was owned by the Ministry of Civil Aviation, was sold to the private sector just after the war. Although it has not made much progress as a regional airport, it has remained as an airport that serves not only the south, but the Channel Islands. It has also accrued to itself many industrial complexes on the airport site. So it is job-promoting as well as being an airfield. Many of the local government airfields have failed on that score. Local authorities have not encouraged their airport managers to examine the commercial side of running the airports by attracting industrial development on their periphery.

On the dissolution of BAA, we should say today, if we never say again, that the British Airports Authority has done an extremely good job. I am proud of the airports that I go through, such as Gatwick and Heathrow. At Heathrow what I knew as a market garden before the war became an airfield with a series of caravans. The expertise, administration and know-how of the BAA have turned it into a great capital asset. The Opposition will say immediately that that involved taxpayers' money. When we talk about the price that the Government will receive, we can only thank the British Airports Authority for slowly but surely bringing that capital asset forward and enabling it to compete with other major airports throughout the world. No one who has seen over the new terminal 4 can say anything other than that it is a very good terminal which will provide competitive services for the next five to 10 years.

The monopolistic nature of a British airport is defined by the control of the Civil Aviation Authority. In British aviation—this may apply to other countries—a company is only as efficient as the CAA will allow it to be. I am thinking particularly of a flight which I shall have to make in two weeks' time to Venice on parliamentary business. That is one of the things that we all have to do from time to time. It will mean leaving my home for several days.

I have to drive to London airport, leave the car there and fly to Venice, but the only service back to the United Kingdom goes into Gatwick. So a man with a car at Heathrow arrives at Gatwick, with all the problems of travel in between.

Mr. Bill Walker (Tayside, North): Is my hon. Friend aware that it is possible to take a helicopter between the two airports?

Mr. Hill: That raises another point of contention which has been mentioned several times. First, when it was in being the normal, impoverished hon. Member could not afford to pay and, secondly, it no longer exists as a service. Therefore, we now rely on the coaches on the M25 in order to get back to our cars.

Mr. Toby Jessel (Twickenham): Is my hon. Friend aware that my constituents will all wish him an extremely happy time in Venice provided that on his return journey he goes from Gatwick to Heathrow via the M25 and does not attempt to carry out that part of his journey by helicopter?

Mr. Hill: I am only too pleased to agree to that because I have no other option. Although I know that the infrastructure between Gatwick and Heathrow is now so much better, it is a problem of time and hon. Members are busy people and have too much to do in the course of their long working week.

Having said that, I must get back to the issue of the CAA and transfer to the private sector. This is just one item in a continuing programme which this very able Conservative Government have brought into being. I am particularly looking forward to the distribution of these shares and, as an ex-employee of British Overseas Airways, to the distribution of shares to British Airways. These are not strange things to the electorate. We have declared our intention that apart from one or two small institutions, we are for giving the country the opportunity to pull back some of the capital assets, on which there has been little or no return. Indeed, in some cases they are costing the taxpayer money. I believe that we are doing a splendid job in our overall programme of privatisation.

Mr. Ridley: I hesitate to ask my hon. Friend this because I might be accused of doing a "commercial", but does he realise that the bus company which provides the service from Gatwick to Heathrow is for sale?

Mr. Hill: That would be a very expensive way for me to get back from Gatwick on the night of my return, but I am sure that a consortium of world travellers within the House could consider it.

Members of the Opposition forget too quickly the privatisation success of the past. They all know about the National Freight Consortium, but they try to avoid talking about it, and there have been many other successes. I am thinking particularly of the Associated British Ports flotation, which was a magnificent success. I know that I am drifting a little, having gone from airports to seaports, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but I ask the Opposition to look at the success stories, of which there are many, and I am sure that the present case will be even more successful.

We had a debate yesterday on amendments and I was quite horrified by what some of my hon. Friends were saying in their attempt to end the duty-free shops, which, as was rightly pointed out, are a crucial part of this commercial undertaking. I am sure that anyone who purchases a group of airports such as this will be delighted not only to keep the existing duty-free shops but to extend them further. It is only too apparent when one goes abroad that certainly the French at Charles de Gaulle airport have the right idea with their duty-free shops. They have parades of shops at which everything imaginable is sold. This is what the airport traveller wishes. He may be early for his flight or his flight may be delayed, and he has time to kill. I see no reason why an airport authority should not extend this to providing a cinema or a night club. Should I go further, indeed? Perhaps I had better not.

Mr. Robert Hughes: Does the hon. Gentleman approve of the practice at some German airports of having porn sex cinemas—which, I hasten to add, I have seen only from the outside?

Mr. Hill: I do not think that the weary traveller should attempt to do anything that would take away his last remaining strength, because, as we all know, it is not just a matter of reaching one's destination. One then has to take a coach for a long distance, and by the time one reaches one's hotel one has forgotten about those delights that had been suggested by the Opposition.

Nevertheless, when one puts one's mind to what can be done regarding facilities at airports, it is clear that the BAA has only scratched the surface. We are perhaps underprovided with hotels at some of these airport sites, and I believe that prices are a bit too high because there is no competition. Certainly an impoverished hon. Member cannot pay £60 to £80 for a night's board and lodging—without breakfast, I might add. So I think that more development, and certainly enterprising development, will be the order of the day.

I have no reason to suggest, and I am sure that no hon. Member would suggest, that anyone who could get together a consortium capable of competing for these airports would be a fool. He would have to make a very careful commercial assessment. He would also have to make a very careful assessment of how he was going to attract airlines to his consortium on a permanent basis.

The grave weakness of most of the speeches when we are discussing privatisation is that we talk about these men as though they are mad speculators of some kind who will come in with £1,000 million and buy, and then sell the next day. They are very clever, highly advised members of the City, and the City itself will look at this with great favour.

I have only one regret—that I did not spend some considerable time in the Committee. I feel that I could have kept the Committee going a little longer, if it had been the wish of the Whips to put me on it. Nevertheless, this is a very interesting Bill and I wish it every success.

5.19 pm

Mr. Alfred Morris (Manchester, Wythenshawe): The hon. Member for Southampton, Test (Mr. Hill) said that he would be brief. I hope to be very brief.

[Mr. Alfred Morris]

When this Bill had its Second Reading it was rightly opposed in the strongest terms by the Opposition. We took the view that at best it was irrelevant and at worst prejudicial to the needs of Britain's civil aviation industry. It was a view shared by many Conservative Members. They made plain their view on Second Reading in January, and again last night on Report, that there were many deficiencies that required correction before the Bill goes to another place. Yet, in spite of all our efforts to introduce some consistency and common sense into the Secretary of State's attitude to the Bill, it is largely unamended. All the deficiencies and the inconsistencies remain.

I now want briefly to identify some of the major inadequacies. Part I of the Bill will seriously prejudice the development of airports outside the south-east. Notwithstanding all the Secretary of State's well publicised promises to eliminate subsidies to Stansted, there is now no doubt that the subsidising of that airport will continue on a massive scale for many years to come. Leaving aside what was said from the Opposition side in the debate last night on subsidising Stansted, he was brilliantly exposed from his own side of the House. The right hon. Gentleman's stance, coupled with the inherent weaknesses of part IV of the Bill, make it abundantly clear that his own 1985 White Paper, which emphasised the importance of fair and equal competition between airports, is nothing more than a "paper policy".

It was shameful of the Secretary of State to make no attempt last night to answer in any way the many serious questions put to him. He portrayed an ignorance which right hon. and hon. Members in all parts of the House found staggering. He is obviously quite incapable of grasping the simple point that being able to see a subsidy does not make it go away. Nor does it become any less damaging to airports outside the south-east. If the right hon. Gentleman finds my judgment harsh, let him read in cold print what his hon. Friend, the hon. Member for Ruislip-Northwood (Mr. Wilkinson) said of him in his speech on my amendments last night. The hon. Gentleman said of the Secretary of State's policy that it is " . . . detrimental to good regional development in Britain.

I believe that the policy stinks. The north of Britain is woefully economically deprived. There is a huge economic gulf between the south-east and the north. Why should people be artificially attracted to airports such as Stansted, which they do not wish to use, when the north is crying out for jobs and the infrastructural development that is associated with airports?"—[Official Report, 9 April 1986; Vol. 95, c. 257.]

I have never heard a more scorching criticism of a Minister from the Benches behind him.

The so-called commitment to introduce private capital into regional airport development has also been exposed as a total and utter sham. The right hon. Gentleman's commitment is so strong that the effect of part II of the Bill will be to bring under strict central Government control an independent trading company which is now operating in the open market.

The Secretary of State referred last night to the "Manchester airport authority". He might have to swallow hard but must now face up to the fact that his nomenclature is wrong. As usual, he is out of date. Manchester Airport plc, to give the enterprise its true title, commenced trading on 1 April. It is operating independently of the local authorities and the Government. For the time being at least it does not need the support of the Government. Not that it ever did.

To listen to the Secretary of State last night, Mr. Deputy Speaker, you might have thought that he was the sole author of Manchester airport's success. We were told that he has been falling over himself to support the airport. If that is right, why did it take over four years for the Government and the Civil Service to acknowledge the airport's real status? Until January 1985 they were arguing that there was no major role for Manchester airport to fulfil in the national context. If the Secretary of State has been handing out licences enabling airlines to operate services into Manchester like toffees, why did it necessitate lengthy and major cross-party parliamentary campaigns to support almost every licence application that has been before him?

I pay tribute tonight to Conservative Members who joined hands with us in campaigning for the new routes.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Michael Spicer): I cannot contain myself much longer. I have never heard a speech which is so distorted and biased, but I shall make my own speech later. I can answer the right hon. Gentleman's question. He asked why it took campaigns for the licences to be granted, and the answer is that most of those campaigns started well before the bodies concerned had ever approached the Government for the licences.

Mr. Morris: The hon. Gentleman is clearly stung by my quote from the hon. Member for Ruislip-Northwood. The Minister said he had never heard a more distorted presentation. I hope he agrees with me that there was never a more scorching criticism of any Front Bench than that which was delivered by his hon. Friend last night.

On the question of licences, let us take the case of Singapore. There was active all-party campaigning to achieve the new route from Manchester to Singapore. There were complaints from Singapore about the attitude of the Department of Transport. The Minister must appreciate that hon. Members on both sides of the House have done much more than some Ministers to promote the expansion of Manchester international airport.

Mr. Michael Spicer rose——

Mr. Morris: I am not giving way again. The hon. Gentleman will have an opportunity to reply to the debate. I hope that he will then acknowledge the strenuous efforts of hon. Members on both sides of the House to promote the development of Manchester international airport. If the Secretary of State had been allowed to have his way over 12 months ago, British Airways would not now be operating out of Manchester.

The airport's success is exclusively attributable to the people of Manchester and the vigour and resourcefulness of the airport's local authority owners. It is those qualities which will again be put to the test by the Secretary of State's attitude to Manchester and the regional airports. They must now compete with a subsidised Stansted and with their hands tied behind their backs. It is, of course, an unequal contest. Yet it is one that we must face up to, and we shall. Indeed there is no alternative, because the airport is our principal hope of rejuvenating our devastated regional economy.

On Second Reading there were Conservative Members who made it clear, that while favouring the principle of the Bill, they were deeply concerned about the detail. The Bill will leave this House tonight for the other place in broadly the same form as it was introduced. It is a bad Bill and it will make bad law. Everyone's concerns about the Bill remain. I wonder how many Conservative Members will join us in opposing its passage this evening.

Mr. Toby Jessel (Twickenham): As always, I listened with great interest to the right hon. Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe (Mr. Morris), particularly when he spoke about Manchester airport. All of us, including those of us who represent constituencies in the south-east, want more traffic to go through Manchester airport. That would be good for Manchester, for industrial development in the north of England, and for the spread of employment. It would also help to relieve airport congestion in the south-east. We all want that; the House is united on that.

Manchester airport has been doing rather well. Year by year its number of passengers has increased, although I cannot say steadily, as there has been a disproportionate increase in the past year. Last night, my hon. Friend the Member for Davyhulme (Mr. Churchill) told us that the number of destinations reached by scheduled flights from Manchester had doubled in the past 12 months. That is very impressive, and it should continue. But no Member of Parliament for Manchester or the north-west has ever explained why he wants to put a lid on expansion at Stansted — thus allowing traffic to be attracted to Manchester — but not on expansion at Heathrow. The case of those hon. Members who represent Manchester and of their sympathisers would be much more convincing if they had some sympathy for my constituents, and the many others who live on the western side of London, who suffer from the noise and congestion caused by air traff[illegible] and if they tried to put a lid on that.

Mr. Alfred Morris: We are talking not about putting a lid on Stansted but of removing subsidisation; we are talking about fair competition. Many of my constituents and people all over the north are sick and tired of having to change planes at Heathrow in order to go to foreign destinations. They want to help the hon. Gentleman to relieve the pressure on Heathrow and other London airports.

Mr. Jessel: Then why does the right hon. Member never say that he is against the fifth terminal at Heathrow? He and his friends are always saying that they want a fifth terminal at Heathrow, and thereby want to increase its size and capacity. That proposition seems totally inconsistent with what the right hon. Member has just said. Until I hear a convincing explanation from him of that point, I am afraid he will not persuade me that he is single-minded and whole-hearted in the objectives he claims to pursue.

I welcome the general objectives of the Bill. Before I finally decide how to vote on the Third Reading, I want to know from the Minister a little more about how the Bill will affect the interests of my constituents, especially in relation to noise, which upsets a great many of them. Every day there are 750 flights in and out of Heathrow. The peace, quiet and health of the people in the area ought to receive a high priority, but I am afraid that it does not receive as high a priority as it should. The Government should pursue policies not merely to maintain the noise at its present level, but to reduce it substantially and permanently.

Mr. Dicks: How many people moved into the constituency after the development of Heathrow at lower prices than they would otherwise have had to pay and are now seeking some protection in order to get the maximum benefit from that situation?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): Order. I understand the anxiety of Members to make constituency speeches, but the number of people who have moved in and out of the area is not really related to the provisions of the Bill. We are discussing the Third Reading and must direct our speeches to the provisions in the Bill.

Mr. Jessel: In the light of your ruling, Mr. Deputy Speaker, which naturally I accept, I may seek to raise this matter on the Adjournment in order to deal with my hon. Friend's point, which is important but which is not, I accept, relevant to the Bill.

I bring up a relevant point that has been triggered off in my mind by what was said by my hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Test (Mr. Hill) in his notable speech just now, when he referred to the financial importance, in the context of this Bill, of duty-free drink. Will the Minister consider a completely new suggestion which I will make and which I believe comes within the ambit of this Bill? I hope that he can assure me that nothing in the Bill excludes my suggestion, which is that the profits from duty-free drink at the airports, which are dealt with in this Bill, should be used to provide for the payment of the cost of double glazing of the windows of my constituents, who could thus be protected from aircraft noise.

Sales of duty-free drink are buoyant. Every year they rise, yet it is noticeable that it costs almost as much to buy a bottle of drink duty-free at the airport as it would cost in a shop outside. On the surface, that fact would appear to negate the advantage of buying duty-free, but the public does not perceive the situation in that way. Whenever people travel, friends and family expect them to return from their journey with a bottle of duty-free, and are surprised if they do not. It seems that this expectation of a gift of duty-free drink upholds the sale of duty-free drink despite the cost of dragging it about the skies. Extra costs are involved, because carrying the extra weight of the duty-free drink about the skies wastes aviation fuel. I once heard a worldwide cost of £1·25 million as the value of fuel wasted on such cargo carried uselessly, since duty-free drink could have been bought on arrival rather than on departure at the airports dealt with in the Bill.

It seems certain that the sale of duty-free drink is buoyant, although the rationale for it has long since disappeared. The idea originated in the purchase of drink at sea. Excise duties were imposed on the purchase of drink ashore and in territories, but it was always duty-free off land and at sea. That situation was extended to aeroplanes as well, and eventually extended to the purchase of drink in airports. I believe that that rationale has disappeared, but I am sure the system will continue because people are so used to it and like it so much that it would be politically impossible for a Government of any colour to get rid of it.

[Mr. Jessel]

The revenue from this source to the British Airports Authority and its successors under the Bill is substantial. Indeed, I understand that it produces a major proportion of the profits of the BAA. I suggest that this money should be used to provide double glazing for the windows of my constituents, who suffer from aircraft noise, living underneath the flight paths from Heathrow. Double glazing is not a complete solution to the problem of aircraft noise, because an open window or a garden cannot be double glazed, but it would mitigate the nuisance somewhat.

Hitherto, the geographical limits for the noise insulation scheme have been determined by a noise footprint based on the so-called noise and number index. Ministers in the Department of Trasport have recently recognised that the noise and number index is likely to be out of date.

The noise and number index is a formula from the 1960s that included as a measure of nuisance a weighting both for the number of flights and the average peak loudness of each flight. Some of us have long believed that the weighting between those two factors in the formula is wrong. That really did not matter during the 1960s and the early 1970s when the frequency of flight and average loudness were increasing together. If the weighting between the two elements in the formula was wrong and they were increasing together, it did not produce any significant distortion.

From the 1970s onwards, the frequency was increasing but the noise from each aircraft started to diminish with the introduction of wide-bodied aircraft, although certain very noisy aircraft such as Concorde have continued and will continue. That seems to suggest that the noise and number index is out of date as a measure of aircraft noise nuisance.

I am sure my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State is absolutely right to question the continuation of the noise and number index as a measure of noise nuisance, and to suggest a different formula which he has called the Leq, a subject on which he has recently put out a consultation document. Contingent on the result of that consultation, if he decides to replace the noise and number index with the Leq index, that completely destroys the historic basis for the provision of noise insulation grants as determined by the noise and number index, using the noise footprints which have hitherto been respected and continue to be invoked by the BAA, the Civil Aviation Authority and other bodies but which will probably soon be dropped.

Therefore, there is a case for looking again, under the Leq measurements, at the noise nuisance that my constituents suffer. I believe that the Leq measurement would show a larger proportion being entitled, under the criteria previously used, to double glazing than has hitherto been the case. So I believe I have made a strong case for applying part of the profits from duty-free drink to double glazing of windows of my constituents in Twickenham.

Does my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State uphold the position foreshadowed in the White Paper with respect to air traffic movement limits and the number of flights at Heathrow? The eddies of air behind the increased number of wide-bodied aircraft mean that greater spacing is needed between aircraft that are landing and taking off. That will result in fewer flights able to use Heathrow.

How will the reduced numbers of aircraft interact with runway capacity? My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport consistently told the House in the airport debate in January——

Mr. George Park (Coventry, North-East): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. You have already tried to tell the hon. Member for Twickenham (Mr. Jessel) to speak to the Third Reading. Is it possible to get him to do so?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There are wide powers in the Bill. I am following closely the speech of the hon. Member for Twickenham (Mr. Jessel). He must relate what he says directly to the Bill.

Mr. Jessel: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I was trying to ask my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State whether the Bill was likely to affect my constituents in the context of aircraft noise. I was relating that point to the number and type of flights which would be influenced by the Bill's provisions. I was referring especially to the interaction of capacity at Stansted, Heathrow and Gatwick.

Mr. Frank Cook (Stockton, North): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The comments by the hon. Member for Twickenham (Mr. Jessel) are not just proof of transgression but are a repetition of transgression. Is the hon. Gentleman trying to breed from his mistakes?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Hon. Members would be well advised to leave it to the Chair to decide whether an hon. Member is in order.

Mr. Jessel: I must take exception to the bogus point of order——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Member should continue his speech. Many hon. Members want to raise points and the hon. Member should give them time to do so.

Mr. Jessel: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I was referring to the Bill, which bears directly on the capacity of Gatwick, Heathrow and Stansted. The Bill is directly concerned with the financing of Stansted. That aspect has been considered at every stage of the Bill's passage. Hon. Members do not want to hear those arguments because they do not like them. I shall find some reason to interrupt their speeches as well on irrelevant grounds.

The fifth terminal at Heathrow would be a major destructive force on the western side of London. It would affect many of our constituencies, including that of my hon. Friend the Member for Epsom and Ewell (Mr. Hamilton), who as a Whip cannot be expected to speak in the debate. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said that one of the Bill's main aims was to provide access to all the airports with which the legislation deals. Heathrow is one such airport. Access would be hampered if capacity were increased. Excessive traffic generated by the demand to use the airport would cause congestion on the radial route along the Cromwell road in west London to Heathrow and on the orbital route around London, the M25. Untrammelled capacity at Heathrow could choke those routes.

I hope that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State will give a full reply to all my points.

5.44 pm

Mr. Michael Meadowcroft (Leeds, West): I do not want to follow the convoluted points of the hon. Member for Twickenham (Mr. Jessel). The noise-aircraft ratio is not the problem—it is simply a matter of a marginal seat.

The Secretary of State said that this was the epilogue of the debate on the Bill. I was surprised that he drew an analogy from a prayer, as though he were relying on that for his success. It was more of a valedictory. I suspect that it meant he was sending the Bill with his good wishes along the corridors to the other place. The right hon. Gentleman failed to commend the brave rebels in the Conservative party for their assistance in the process of healthy opposition to the main points of the Bill.

In tabling reasoned amendments, Liberal Members gave three reasons why the Bill was not satisfactory. As the Secretary of State has pointed out, the Bill has reached Third Reading largely unscathed from the Committee and Report stages. We argued, first, that, if there is a monopoly, it should be in public rather than private hands. It can be argued that if a body is not a monopoly there need not be any dogmatic reason why it should be in public rather than in private hands.

My second argument against the Bill is that it fails to encourage diversity. It is strange that Conservative Members are not prepared to encourage a flexible approach by the smaller-scale airports which would benefit from avoiding a uniform solution. It is odd that there is no possibility of a mixture of private and statutory collaboration. As the right hon. Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe (Mr. Morris) pointed out, a case can be made for regional decisions on the right solution for a particular airport. It is not fair to say to those who have promoted Manchester over the years, "You will be put in the pot like everyone else and will be given the same solution even though you have succeeded so admirably."

Thirdly, there is an apparent failure to understand the importance of municipal pride and enterprise. The hon. Member for Southampton, Test (Mr. Hill) misunderstood the point I made about building up municipal airports. He said that the money will go back to the people as shareholders. The money has been put into the airports by all the ratepayers according to the proportion they pay in rates, but it will come back to only a tiny minority. Conservative Members are fond of saying that the number of shareholders is increasing, and I am glad that it is, but only 2 million out of the 56 million people are private shareholders. It is hardly a consolation to ratepayers in some of the municipal airport areas to say that the money will come back to them as shareholders.

Mr. Hill: Is the hon. Gentleman saying that ratepayers who have invested in the municipal airports will all lose money, or will they receive an additional benefit?

Mr. Meadowcroft: That is a fair point. The answer is that it varies. The forecasts over the years have been too optimistic. I suspect that the future for the economy as a whole is not as bright as some of those who wanted to invest large capital sums expected. The £20 million invested in the development of Leeds-Bradford airport was based on an estimate of 800,000 extra package tour holidays from Leeds-Bradford by the year 1987-88. I do not believe that that number will be reached.

Ratepayers' money was invested in those airports in good faith. Once the shares are offered on the open market, the advantages will not return to the city as a whole. One sacrifices local pride at one's peril. The Liberal party is not dogmatic about economic structure. It is difficult in many cases to defend aspects of public ownership.

The Government were faced with those three major points in the reasoned amendments but failed to answer any of them.

The alternative to public ownership is not necessarily to privatise. There are different ways of having hybrid schemes which would not fall foul of the rules of debate in the House. There are different ways of having collaboration between public and private bodies and different ways for the smaller airports to have some sort of co-operative structure. None of that has been essayed in the Bill as it is now before the House. That is why I believe that the reasons we put forward on Second Reading were accurate. None of those reasons has been met and I hope that the House will refuse to give the Bill a Third Reading.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am grateful for the hon. Gentleman's brevity.

5.50 pm

Mr. Terry Dicks (Hayes and Harlington): I am one of the main rebels against the Bill. I expressed my doubts about its contents on Second Reading, in Committee, as Opposition Members who served on the Committee will know, and yesterday on Report. I still feel strongly about it. I agree completely with the principle of privatisation, but there are many things wrong with the Bill. Earlier my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said that because he had the votes in the Lobby the Bill must be right. That is not the case. The Government just got their whipping right. They called a three-line Whip and a payroll vote. That is the bread and butter of politics, and one cannot grumble too much about that.

At this stage let me at least pay tribute to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State because they have listened to what has been said. They have not acted very much on what has been said, but at least they listened. In Committee, and again yesterday, even if the points made have not been written into the legislation, at least those of us concerned were able to make our points clearly.

I pay particular tribute to the Minister concerned with my amendment, which sought to give some protection to concessionaires. Although, with the help of Opposition Members and some of my hon. Friends, the amendment was passed in Committee, the Government were able to remove it yesterday. However, in doing so, at least the Minister has met some of the concessionaires and me, recognised some of the points we made, and made some movement towards meeting our requirements. I am genuinely grateful for that. It is not often that a Back Bencher has an opportunity to get an amendment through in Committee with the support of Opposition Members. It was something special. Although the amendment is not now in the Bill, at least the Minister acknowledged that I had a point and the Government have moved a little towards it.

I must take this opportunity to say what the concessionaires give to the British Airports Authority. In 1984-85, £98 million came to the British Airports Authority as income from concessionaires. Two thirds of the BAA's commercial income came from concessionaires, but the Bill makes no reference to them in any shape or form — at least not at the moment, although it will when the amendment goes through in the other place. The concessionaires were not thought to be relevant and were not looked upon as users of the airport. However, as I said, we have made the point and we have had some concessions, so we must be reasonably happy about that.

My hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Test (Mr. Hill) spoke about better utilisation of airport land and facilities. He spoke about cinemas and other facilities. That concerns many of us because we believe that a great deal of airport space should be used to provide airport-related activities. Some of us are concerned that, in looking for a quick return on their investment, shareholders will be pushing the BAA into providing just those facilities that my hon. Friend mentioned, when they should be pushing the BAA to provide better airport-related facilities, not cinemas and bigger duty-free shops.

Some of us feel strongly and are bitterly disappointed that the Bill will not provide for the breaking up of the London system. We believe that Stansted should be made to stand on its own. Despite the pressures placed on the Government yesterday, that is not to be. I am sure that my right hon. Friend and hon. Friend will be aware that those of us who are involved will be watching the financing of Stansted very closely, not only because we think that it should stand on its own, but because we must look to the needs of the regions, especially Manchester airport, which must not be seen to be pushed aside because of the Government's direction on Stansted. Woe betide the Government or anybody else if we see that, despite the assurances, money is going to Stansted that should not go there and that Manchester and other airports are losing as a result.

We are also disappointed that we did not get a better reassurance from the Minister with regard to the activities of the scheduling committee. As I said yesterday, the airlines at Heathrow—I speak especially for Heathrow because it is in my constituency—are happy with the scheduling arrangements. I have a feeling that things will not change very much, but perhaps we could have a firmer assurance from the Secretary of State or the Minister with regard to the scheduling committee's activities. I am aware of the problems of runway capacity and the timing of incoming and outgoing flights. However, I hope that the Secretary of State will make it clear that the present scheduling committee arrangements will be allowed to continue unfettered and that any intervention on his part will be as a very last resort.

In a sense, the Bill touches on the position at Heathrow and its future development. I do not accept the concern of my hon. Friend the Member for Twickenham (Mr. Jessel) but he has never missed an opportunity—good luck to him — to advocate his constituents' problems about airport noise. I made the point—and you quite rightly rebuked me for it, Mr. Deputy Speaker—that we never know how many people buy houses at lower prices in an area with aircraft noise and then expect higher values for them. I want to emphasise that not every hon. Member representing a west London constituency is concerned about airport noise. Some of us have taken a wider view of the civil aviation industry, and the airports especially.

Mr. Bill Walker: Jobs.

Mr. Dicks: Yes. As my hon. Friend says, we are also concerned about jobs. I do not care where jobs are created as long as they are created.

I am fully aware that the consultants are now looking into the infrastructure problems around Heathrow with regard to access. We know, even before the fourth terminal is open, that something needs to be done. I am sure that the Minister will tell us later that the possibility of a fifth terminal is not completely ruled out. We need immediate action on the infrastructure problems. We need some help towards the provision of the Hayes bypass, which will not only help my constituents but ensure easier and better access to Heathrow. Heathrow is the world's major international airport. It must be kept that way and left unfettered as far as is humanly possible.

I want to issue a final warning to the British Airports Authority and the parent company which will take over later. The BAA may have moved from being a public monopoly to a private monopoly. It may be gleefully thinking, "We have done it again. We have persuaded the Department of Transport to do exactly what we want when we want." I and many of my hon. Friends will be watching closely. Sir Norman Payne, his fellow directors and senior managers should not think it is over yet. We shall be watching them closely. One false step and we shall be after them.

5.57 pm

Mr. Tony Lloyd (Stretford): I shall preface my remarks by saying that I hope that all my hon. Friends and Conservative Members will have the chance to speak, because some of them have taken an interest in the Bill all the way through. I regret that some of the speeches earlier were self-indulgent and used up much time.

Despite the fact that the Secretary of State has told us that he feels that the Bill is right, it is quite clear, from the massive amount of criticism that it is still attracting from both sides of the House, that the Bill has little credibility within the House. It has been pointed out that it was only because of the Government's own placemen, those seeking advancement, and their ability to whip through the payroll vote that they were able to hang on to their majority. It was a serious rebuff that on a number of amendments the majority dropped as low as it did. That reflects the fact that the Bill is irrelevant to national airports policy, which is basically what we accused it of being on Second Reading. It is especially irrelevant because of the way in which it treats the different airports in the airport system.

I will not go at length into arguments that took place last night, but the idea that we should enshrine the right to private monopoly in legislation is a new concept, even for the Conservative party. I know that it greatly upsets some of the Conservative Members who feel that their principles are being betrayed by the Government. They are quite right to feel betrayed. It is dangerous that an under-regulated private monopoly has been created within the British Airports Authority.

I contrast that with the almost childlike obsession of the Department of Transport and its political masters with Manchester airport. Many of the actions that were taken against municipal airports were guided by the vendetta against Manchester. The elaborate nature of the financial controls are designed, ultimately, to drive Manchester from its position as an independent private company back into this peculiar corporate structure which the Government have given us.

The use of those controls will prevent Manchester from borrowing and will prevent the development of Manchester airport. The Government hope that they will be able to force the local authority into privatisation. I regret that the economic future of Manchester, the north-west and Scotland will be jeopardised by the Government's ideological trap. They laid the trap and have fallen into it. Restrictions on capital are extremely dangerous. I hope that, even at this late stage, the Government will reconsider the stupidity of imposing such controls.

There are other issues that affect general airport policy. On the Secretary of State's desk there is a submission from the passenger transport authority in the Manchester area and from British Rail for a rail link to Manchester airport. The details of that submission have been published. Can the Minister tell me whether the Secretary of State is prepared to meet an all-party delegation to discuss the rail link? We could make progress on a matter that is important for the future of the airport. Will the Minister also agree to publish the details of the submission for a rail link to Stansted, which is a matter of great importance?

Mr. Michael Spicer: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way at this point. I shall answer his question straightaway in case I forget to do so later.

The Department of Transport is deeply involved in the discussions that are taking place. Whether an all-party delegation should meet my right hon. Friend or other Ministers is, perhaps, not the issue. The Department is assessing the viability of both potential rail links. I am not sure what point the hon. Gentleman [illegible] is seeking to make on the matter. The matter is the subject of intense discussion and analysis.

Mr. Lloyd: I refer the Minister to the brief exchange between him and my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe (Mr. Morris). That exchange concerned the Department's helpfulness to Manchester with regard to applications for new routes. The Minister said that the Department of Transport was beyond reproach. However, I share the view of the Singapore Government that its application for a new air route with Manchester was finally granted by the Department, after two refusals, due to the massive amount of pressure which was raised in Manchester. There were also delays before Iberia were ultimately granted an application for flights to Manchester. Such actions do not give one great faith in what goes on at the Department of Transport.

I am aware that the Department is actively involved in the discussions on the proposed rail link to Manchester airport, but I ask that there should be an all-party meeting so that the Government's thinking on the matter is known. In that way we can make progress. If such a meeting could take place it would be helpful. I will let the Minister dwell upon that matter.

The Bill does not address itself to the problems of our airport systems. We still lack an airport policy. When the Labour party comes into office such a policy will be a matter of considerable urgency. We shall use some of the powers that exist in the Bill to create an effective structure to meet the nation's air transport needs. Sadly, such needs will not be met by the present Secretary of State.

Mr. John Carlisle (Luton, North): I will not follow the parochial arguments of the hon. Member for Stretford (Mr. Lloyd) about Manchester airport. He will understand if my remarks concern Luton airport.

The hon. Member for Stretford paid a tribute to those who have been involved with the Bill through all its stages. I must apologise to the House because this is my first intervention on the Bill. The simple reason is that my hon. Friend the Member for Luton, South (Mr. Bright) would normally be here to speak for the interests of his constituency. Unfortunately, my hon. Friend is indisposed and I am an inadequate stand-in to represent him and the airport. I hope the House will forgive me if my knowledge of the Bill is scant compared to that of other hon. Members.

I am sorry that my hon. Friend is not present, as he has shown enormous enthusiasm for the Bill. Such enthusiasm regrettably caused my hon. Friend to fall out with the leader of Luton council, who opposed the Bill. My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State may have witnessed such opposition on his recent visit to Luton. The arguments which have been put forward by my hon. Friend and by the Government in Committee have allayed some of the worst fears of Luton borough council. There is a much broader welcome in Luton for the Bill.

We are extremely proud of our airport. It is extremely well run and we are not afraid of the opportunity to become a plc. I am pleased to report to the Minister that the feeling in this constituency is more welcoming to the Bill than it was some months ago. The importance of Luton airport to the district cannot be under-estimated. Last night, that was highlighted in an intervention by my hon. Friend the Member for Bedfordshire, South-West (Mr. Madel) when he said that Luton airport was the second largest employer in the town. The prosperity of the airport is crucial to the prosperity of the town and the area.

We agree in principle with the Bill and agree that airport management can be strengthened by an intake of new directors. We are anxious to use the new sources of finance which will be made available by the Bill. When the plc is formed, I believe many local people will wish to buy shares and become part of one of the greatest assets of the area.

We welcome the assurance on pension rights given by my right hon. Friend yesterday evening. There has been much concern from one particular union. I have not been able to get that union's reaction to the altercations in the House yesterday but it appears that my right hon. Friend's words have allayed the worst fears. However, my right hon. Friend did not go as far as some unions wanted. His assurances were reasonable and should be welcomed by thinking people.

My hon. Friends the Members for Bedfordshire, North (Sir T. Skeet) and for Bedfordshire, South-West (Mr. Madel) and myself supported an amendment because of our fears of the development of a continuing subsidisation of Stansted. The Minister will be aware that there will be much concern in Luton about the unfair competition of Stansted and its effect upon Luton. Luton has been affected more than any other airport because of its proximity to Stansted. My hon. Friends and myself felt obliged to go into the Lobby against my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State because we felt our fears were not allayed by his assurances. I was pleased to support the right hon. Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe (Mr. Morris) and my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Withington (Mr. Silvester). We want to encourage scheduled flights from Luton and we are not afraid of unfair competition. If Stansted continues as a subsidised airport and is not made to stand on its own feet—the Bill will not completely force it to do so—we shall be permanently worried about competition and our attempt to attract the 5 million passengers as envisaged by my right hon. Friend will be even more difficult. Nevertheless, we are ready to take up the challenge.

I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will have time to answer three questions, but, if not, I hope that he will write either to me or to my hon. Friend the Member for Luton, South. Luton borough council and I are worried about the financial arrangements in clause 20. At present the airport has a debt of some £17 million which needs an annual servicing of £2 million. We are worried that because of the Bill the servicing of that debt will have to be retained by the ratepayers, rather than taken on by the plc. If that is the case, it will have a devastating effect on Luton ratepayers. With the loss of £2·5 million in rate support grant, the ratepayers would face a massive rise of 60 per cent. in an attempt to find £4·5 million in the coming financial year.

I am cognisant of my precarious election positon and of that of my hon. Friend the Member for Luton, South, and I know that my hon. Friend the Minister is anxious that we return and represent that town in the House. If a 60 per cent. rates increase were proposed, probably in election year, we would have difficulty in persuading the electorate that the Bill was the best thing since sliced bread. Will my hon. Friend remind the Secretary of State that that is causing great anxiety in Luton? Can he assure me tonight that the plc can take on the servicing debt? If not, I hope that he will write to me or my hon. Friend the Member for Luton, South.

My second question is about clause 17. I apologise to the House that thanks to the good service of a Labour Whip I went home last night at a quarter to 11, so I was not present for the altercations on clause 17. It provides the basis for airport directors to remain as councillors and participate in council meetings. There is great concern about the composition of the council in Luton, where we have 23 Conservative members, 17 Labour members, seven Liberal members and one Independent Labour member. In such circumstances, if members of the council are appointed as airport directors, as we expect them to be, their interests on the council and in airport matters could conflict with clause 17. Can my hon. Friend the Minister clarify that position, which I also raised on Second Reading? Does he consider that position to be similar to that in the Transport Act 1985, or is there no way that those airport directors can take part in any proceedings on airport business in the council chamber?

My third anxiety relates to the time for proceeding towards a plc. I ask him on behalf of the borough council whether, when we proceed towards the plc, we can have a little more time and flexibility. He will understand that a vast number of different departments, such as the finance department, the environment health department, the architect's department and, even, the recreational services department, are involved in a local authority airport such as Luton. Those various departments will need a certain amount of time to unscramble the various operations that they perform at the airport. Considering the provisions of the Bill and, particularly, my right hon. Friend's comments in Committee, we believe that that unscrambling will take some time. I do not know whether he appreciates the problems that we could face. It will not be simple to assimilate the new procedures, but, obviously, we shall do so as efficiently as we can.

We wish the Bill the best of speed in the other place, and I ask the Government to consider the necessary amendments that I have proposed. It is a first-class Bill, and certainly one which the people of Luton heartily welcome.

Mr. Peter Pike (Burnley): I must disagree with the line pursued by the hon. Member for Luton, North (Mr. Carlisle), and I certainly shall not vote for the Third Reading of the Bill tonight.

The Secretary of State said that the lack of interventions signified agreement with the Bill. However, my hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeen, North (Mr. Hughes) was absolutely right in saying that the Government had made so few concessions that Labour Members felt it was pointless to intervene, especially with the present Secretary of State who, as in debates on the Transport Bill, may have listened, but failed at all stages to take any notice and to make any concessions.

I certainly agree with the Secretary of State that we should have an airports policy for the United Kingdom which will attract airlines and air traffic, especially international and intercontinental flights, to British airports rather than to Frankfurt or other continental airports. That is essential. However, I do not agree with him that the Bill goes in that direction. I do not believe that it will solve our civil aviation problems. It fails to provide a national airports policy, to develop our regional airports and to solve our present problems.

I have grave reservations about the proposal to privatise the BAA—owned London airports together. I cannot see why Gatwick, Heathrow and Stansted should all come under one owner in the private sector. Obviously, I do not agree with privatisation to start with, but if they must be privatised, I do not see why they cannot be split up. Nor do I see why Stansted should not be left to stand on its own feet, especially if there is potential for it to develop. At every stage I have opposed that encouragement, but the Government have a stubborn bias and continually widen the rift between north and south. I know that they will encourage the growth of that airport at the expense of our regional airports. If the Government believe that Stansted should grow, why should it not fight for that growth on its own merits?

The Secretary of State's policy of privatising the airports together and creating a monopoly in London conflicts considerably with his position last year on the Transport Bill when he decided that the National Bus Company had to be privatised, but not as a whole, although it faces municipal and private competition. On that occasion there was a good case for privatising the company as an entity as it faced considerable competition.

The Bill fails adequately to safeguard the position of employees. Despite the Government's concession on pensions last night, I am still gravely concerned about the future of employees, whether employed by municipal airports or the BAA. Once again, the Government intend to make privatisation work through worse conditions for existing and future employees in the industry, and by not giving them the sort of conditions to which they are entitled or a guarantee as to the type of pension scheme which most employees have at present.

The Secretary of State told us that agreement had not yet been reached on the shareholdings for employees and the type of concessions that they are to be offered. Once again, the Government have failed with regard to employee participation. If they genuinely believe in employee shareholding, why do they not also provide for employee directors to sit on the boards of the privatised industries? The percentage of shares that will be taken by employees will be so small as to have no impact on the future of the companies.

My final point is about Manchester airport. My hon. Friend the Member for Stretford (Mr. Lloyd) and the North of England Regional Consortium have made the case forcibly and concisely for Manchester and the other regional airports. Their comments were used yesterday, and so I will not refer to them today. Over many years, the Manchester authority has exercised foresight by making massive capital investments when it appeared that those investments would take some years to bear fruit. The forecasts were usually proved to be pessimistic, and the position rapidly moved into profit. The Bill, however, places grave limitations on Manchester airport's ability to spend capital in the future. Such restrictions will inhibit the growth of Manchester as a plc owned by the Manchester local authorities. I acknowledge what has been done in the past. We have a great airport with tremendous potential. I believe that, given sufficient freedom, it could develop.

My final point arises on all privatisation debates. The BAA will be privatised, and the Government will receive a capital sum. The Government have spoken about the BAA's record over many years. That record is extremely good, in spite of the shackles that the Government have imposed on publicly owned industries. The proceeds will be used once, and the income thrown away for year after year. Such assets should remain under public control, whether that of the BAA or of the municipal authorities, and we should encourage the growth of airports in that way, giving full encouragement to the development of our regional airports as well as the London airports.

Mr. Bill Walker (Tayside, North): I declare an interest as director of two aviation companies. I have also tried, throughout the passage of the Bill, to look after the Scottish interest as a Scottish Member on the Government Benches. I believe that some of my Scottish colleagues are, in their kindest thoughts, calling me "airport Bill". They often call me other things, and I much prefer "airport Bill".

The Bill will bring about substantial change. It is an interesting and exciting Bill, but, as the Government know, I still believe that there are some deficiencies in it. I put down amendments both in Committee and on Report. I believe that, in its present form, the Bill will not increase competition. I believe in competition. I know that the Government are wedded to competition. Sadly, if anyone imagines that the Bill in its present form will increase competition, that view must be based on hope rather than experience. By privatising the BAA, we are turning a public monopoly into a private one.

When I talk about the BAA, I can always feel the eyes of the BAA on the back of my neck. I do not dislike what the BAA has done. It has done well. I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Test (Mr. Hill). Under its terms and conditions and the rules under which it has operated, the BAA has done a very good job. However, I understood that the Government policy that was to be embodied in the Bill was to be that of improving competition, providing great opportunities for the investment of public funds, and encouraging more openness in the system. Such a policy will not be achieved. I understand the limitations facing the Government when they consider how to privatise the BAA. When attempting to privatise an organisation, one needs to have the support at least of the workers or the management. If, perhaps, the employees are hostile, one needs the support of the management. If both management and employees are hostile, a difficult job becomes almost impossible.

That is why, while I supported amendments for the break-up of the BAA, I recognised that in the end we would probably end up with something like the present Bill with seven companies being privatised under one overseeing company. I accepted that, but I was surprised that more was not done in the Bill to allow competition on the airports. Ministers have said that they wish to see such competition, but there is nothing in the Bill to encourage it, and experience in other fields suggests to me that it will not arise. The provisions in the Bill will not produce the result that the Government want.

Many questions remain unanswered. While the Bill was in Committee, I twice asked a question about the local authority airport plcs. The question was never properly answered. Under the arms-length arrangements that will exist after the Bill becomes an Act, the shareholders are the local authority. I asked who would be entitled to attend the annual general meetings. One of the pressure points on any plc is what happens at the AGM. It is necessary to set everything in order so that one can tell the shareholders at the AGM, "Look how good we are." As I understand it, the meetings will be attended by the duly appointed elected councillors. The majority of them may be of the opinion that they should be doing something in a certain way because of their political point of view. They will be perfectly entitled to their views, but how will that affect the pressure that is supposed to be caused by the fact that the airport has become a plc? I wonder whether there will be any pressure, other than pressure to do exactly what the councillors want—which is what the directors may be required to do. That is another weakness in the Bill.

I approve of turning the local authority airports into plcs. I approve of making the BAA a plc. That is the right thing to do. I believe that the Bill will achieve many of the objectives that I would wish to see achieved in a new and enterprising British airports system. That system would include the new BAA plc. In Scotland, there would be the civil aviation airports. Those eight airports would also be operating as a separate plc, as the Bill stands. However, there is nothing in the Bill to suggest that they, the local authority plcs or the BAA will become involved in any competition on the airports themselves. The Bill will not lead to competition. That will be a weakness. We will not achieve what the Government set out to achieve. Notwithstanding that, there is much good in the Bill.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State was right to consider in the Bill the problems of traffic distribution.

[Mr. Bill Walker]

The Bill will deal wisely and sensibly with such matters. Some members of the Committee had doubts about that and tabled amendments to improve the operation of the mechanism. There is no doubt that the Bill retains the present voluntary arrangements which my right hon. Friend mentioned earlier. The scheduling committees will continue until such time as they are unable to resolve the problems. When that time comes, there will be a mechanism to deal with the problem. That is clearly laid out in the Bill. I hope that it will never be used. I hope that the scheduling committees will continue, for the foreseeable future, to continue to make decisions on slots and allocations, because that is the best way to do it.

I welcome that part of the Bill which encourages employee shareholding and my right hon. Friend's comment that a British Telecom-type shareholding will be encouraged for BAA employees. That is a good thing. I wonder whether the Bill as it stands is equipped to encourage the necessary expansion to meet the demands that we expect at Heathrow and Gatwick.

I also welcome, although with minor qualifications, the fact that, once the airports become plcs and the separate companies are set up, the accounts will show clearly how, for example, the Scottish civilian airports are subsidised —they are properly subsidised—and by how much. I welcome that, because those of us in Scotland who care dearly about the infrastructure wish the money to be used sensibly and wisely. I welcome the fact that the accounts will show how Prestwick is operating and how Glasgow, Edinburgh and Aberdeen airports are progressing. I also welcome the fact that we shall see clearly that there will be no transfer of funds from the three airports in the London system for the assistance of Stansted. The treatment of capital expenditure and investment in the new plcs is a big improvement. At present, the treatment of the British Airports Authority's accounts differs from the treatment of revenue and capital in plcs, so the change will benefit the BAA.

In general, the Bill follows the lines that I would have wished. I am unhappy with some parts, but in general the Bill does what I believe should be done. I give it a qualified welcome.

Mr. Robert Litherland (Manchester, Central): Having been a member of the Standing Committee that considered the Bill, I witnessed the tremendously rough passage that it received. The Government were defeated twice, and on another occasion only the Chairman's casting vote saved them. To add insult to injury, the three amendments were tabled by Conservative Back-Bench Members of a Committee that was supposed to consist of future Ministers. Many parliamentary private secretaries were present. It is always in the Government's interests if Back Bench Members do not speak, but the Hansard reports of the Committee show that the Government Back-Bench Members were extremely vocal.

One issue on which Conservative Members were vocal was consultation. The first thing that the Committee did was to put right the oversight of the Secretary of State to pay tribute to the BAA workers. We said that they were the finest workers in the world and that they should be given credit for the success of the company. At the same time, we said that there should be proper and meaningful consultation. We asked the Secretary of State to table on Report an amendment to correct the lack of consultation, but nothing happened.

The BAA workers visited the House yesterday, expressed their anxiety about their future and queried what was in store for them in terms of job security and pensions. They are worried that a change of ownership might be detrimental to their well-being and that of their families. We fear that the workers will be faced with a fait accompli and that their anxieties will not be alleviated.

During the debate on consultation, the hon. Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker) said:

> "Nothing that I have said suggests that people investing their time and skills is not an investment. Of course, it is an investment. I believe that the greatest asset any organisation has is the people who work for it. We often confuse what companies and organisations do with the people who work for them. Those people are what really matters. I believe that that is what is behind the amendment." — [Official Report, Standing Committee J, 6 February 1986; c. 13.]

But the workers are still terribly confused.

Last night, there was another rebellion by more than 30 Conservative Back-Bench Members about Stansted's becoming a free-standing airport. That rebellion should show the Government and the Secretary of State that they have got it wrong. They cobbled the Bill together and even after amendments it remains cobbled. Nothing has changed. The Government Back-Bench Members were not convinced in Committee, nor were they convinced last night.

In his reply to the debate last night, the Secretary of State gave excuses rather than good reasons, and his efforts to suggest that Stansted would not receive a hidden, large and unfair subsidy came across in the pathetic lame excuse that Manchester had outstripped Stansted in its development in recent years and that the Government had assisted Manchester in its progress. If that is the case, why was Stansted given the go-ahead for a rail link while Manchester is still waiting for one? If the Government intend Manchester airport to grow, it should have been given the link long ago.

The Government are in another quandary as to how to tackle the problems of Manchester airport. The Secretary of State agreed that, if all the 10 district authorities could agree, they could set up a public limited company. After receiving legal advice on company procedure, they have now set up a legitimate company and have embarrassed the Government. They have taken the Secretary of State at his word.

The Guardian quoted the Under-Secretary of State as saying:

> "Local authority airports would be compelled to transfer their airport operations into public limited companies and sell shares to the public at the earliest opportunity. But if local authorities kept a 51 per cent. stake in their airports, the Government would retain a powerful influence over their affairs through existing controls over local authority spending."

I hope that when the Under-Secretary replies he will tell us Manchester's position. The council now has 100 per cent. of the shares. Manchester city has 55 per cent. and the districts have 5 per cent. of the shares each. How can a company be brought back under local government restraints when it will have been borrowing from the private market for a number of months? So far the Under-Secretary has not answered that question. Even now he has not listened to one word that I have said. He is having a conversation. He wants only 10 minutes to reply and to answer that question would take much longer. I have been asking the hon. Gentleman questions now for the past five minutes and he has not heard a word that I have said.

Mr. Michael Spicer: I heard.

Mr. Litherland: I thank the hon. Gentleman very much indeed.

A directive from the Department of the Environment's consultation document said that it was "open to authorities to establish wholly or partly owned limited companies. Under the present system capital expenditure by such a company does not count as prescribed expenditure by the authority that controls it, but contributions of a capital nature to the company by the authority do count. Moreover, such companies have freedom, subject to their articles of association, to borrow from the financial markets."

We believe that Manchester now has those articles and can borrow from the private market, so how can the Government possibly bring it back under the contraints of local authority finance?

The practical differences between the two types of companies in the Bill are significant and have never been understood by the Government. I am waiting for the Under-Secretary of State's reply to see whether, at last, he has understood what the argument is about. That is why we thought there was hybridity in the Bill. Manchester airport is set up as something entirely different. Manchester international airport no longer exists and a new company has been set up that can borrow from the private market. How can the Government once again bring it under the constraints of a local authority?

Mr. Alan Haselhurst (Saffron Walden): I apologise to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the House, for not having been here for the resumption of the debate this afternoon. Unlike my hon. Friend the Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker) who was once delayed by an aeroplane, I was delayed by a British Rail train that was not getting there. That explains my late arrival in the House this afternoon.

In some ways the Airports Bill is a Bill of opportunity and lost opportunity. It is an opportunity to put some of our airports on a sounder business footing, and that I welcome. It is perhaps a lost opportunity to put them on a sounder competitive footing. We have fought for that argument. It may be taken up in another place. It was a real and viable argument and I hope that the arguments that were put that did not gain a majority will, nevertheless, be found with hindsight to have been the more compelling.

The Bill is an opportunity to privatise and to put at arm's length from the Government the operation of our airports, and that I welcome. Yet it seems that what the Government have thrust away from themselves with one hand they have been inclined to bind to themselves with the other with the panoply of controls which the Bill enables them to have.

Nevertheless, I speak at this stage of the Bill's proceedings in a slightly more conciliatory spirit than the hon. Member for Manchester, Central (Mr. Litherland), because I generally support the Bill. I welcome the fact that the Government have tightened the provisions to guard against the cross-subsidy factor which has been of such great concern. I am grateful to the Government for particularising the weapon of control of air traffic movements to Stansted which is, effectively, what has been done.

That is not only in the interests of those of my constituents who have been concerned about the possible future extension of Stansted, but it recognises the concerns of the aviation industry as to how such a power might at some future time be used.

I am not sure whether the Bill fully reflects all the interests of the airline as customers of the airports, but enough has been said on that for good sense to prevail and one hopes that working relationships will respect the interests that the airlines have in the use of our airports and that we might see a constructive relationship in the future which does not have some of the difficulties that have attended those relationships in the past.

I cannot help thinking that no part of my constituency could have had greater attention throughout the Bill's proceedings than the airport at Stansted, which is close to the village of Stansted Mountfitchet. It would be surprising if any part of my constituency gets such particular attention again, unless, of course, the Government were to propose to dispose of nuclear waste in the region—heaven forbid.

I bear no rancour over the development of Stansted airport. I wish it success, if modest success. I trust that no one will misunderstand that. I have never been opposed to the development of Stansted. I happen to have a view that a more limited development is the right thing for the industry and for the neighbourhood in which that airport is situated. I continue to hope that we shall be able to achieve in practice over the years the sort of compromise with which everyone can live.

I harbour no ill will to the BAA whose opponent I have had to be at various stages of the Bill. It has misunderstood my motives as it doubtless thinks that I have misunderstood its. However, throughout the Bill's proceedings the argument has been solely about what is best for the British aviation industry and for the best operation of British airports. It is my desire to work with the BAA in my constituency, as I would work with any other employer or supplier of services therein. I am grateful for the cordial relationship with the director of Stansted airport, Allan Munds, who is trying to set relationships in the area on a better footing than perhaps they have been in the past.

I am still inclined to wonder what may flow from the Bill. It will not be the final word on the pattern of Britain's airports. Allusion has already been made to Heathrow. One of the falsest trails that has been set throughout the airports debate has been the question of the competitive position of London, as though that required the full expansion of three airports. Hon. Members on both sides of the House have had to say time and time again that the nub of the argument is whether Heathrow can be made to be the sharpest competitive force against the foreign airport systems. That is what it is all about, and it will come to that in the end. One hopes that nothing in the Bill will preclude the possibility of the maximisation of facilities at Heathrow.

The Government have had difficulty in picking a way through British airports policy. It has pleased the Government to obtain a development at Stansted in the first place. It has pleased the Government to say that the limitation at Heathrow is the runway capacity. I shall not go into those arguments now, but they will not go away. We shall have to turn back to them at some stage. We must ensure that Heathrow, together with the other airports, are all a success in the name of Britain.

[Mr. Alan Haselhurst]

I hope for the best for British civil aviation and it is because I do so that I hope for the best from the Bill, and I shall certainly support it in the Lobbies tonight.

6.49 pm

Mr. Roger King (Birmingham, Northfield): In the three years that I have had the pleasure of being a Member of the House, I seem to have involved myself, by dint of serving on the Select Committee on Transport, with the future of airports. Indeed, that Committee for nearly 12 months discussed the future structure of British airports. I was privileged to take part in those discussions and to compare the running of airports not just in this country but in other parts of the world. Although the Bill does not outline what I would have liked as the preferred solution, I think that it goes a long way to improving the potential of our airports system to compete with the systems in Europe.

I felt that privatised British airports, with Gatwick as a separate undertaking, might be a preferred solution for the London area. None the less, given the criticisms and problems that a separate Gatwick might well have raised, I am happy to accept the Bill as it stands and the controls introduced therein. Never has an undertaking had so many restrictions put on it to ensure as much fair play as possible in the future privatised system.

I mentioned that I was interested in airports. Indeed, airport security is a matter under discussion in the Select Committee. Although our national and international airports are considered to be gateway airports to the world, it must be remembered that they are also gateway airports into this country. I hope that when we publish our findings we shall endeavour to point out the risks of having too much open security visible to everybody, because of the danger of deterring people from coming to this country.

In the course of debates in Committee, many points were raised by hon. Members on both sides. My hon. Friend the Member for Meriden (Mr. Mills) and I had the pleasure of highlighting the problems of Birmingham which I wish now to repeat. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State was very generous when he summed up our concern about Birmingham airport's £30 million debt as a result of expansion. He was kind enough to say that he would be very flexible about the establishment of a debt-equity ratio. He said:

"It is important to find a solution for each airport to suit its financial circumstances. We shall be as helpful as we can in arranging a debt-equity ratio for Birmingham that will be as advantageous as possible." — [Official Report, Standing Committee J, 6 March 1986; c. 454.]

I hope that we can hold him to his word and that Birmingham can prosper as a public limited company, which I am sure it will be.

6.52 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Michael Spicer): I suspect the House will not wish me to prolong this debate much further. The debates we have had on this Bill on Second Reading, during 19 sittings of the Standing Committee and until the early hours of this morning on Report have been detailed and at times complex and highly technical. Many of those right hon. and hon. Members who have contributed to the debates have been extremely knowledgeable about the subjects that they discussed, and Ministers have had to be pretty agile just to keep up with them.

Several of my hon. Friends have displayed not only the depths of their knowledge on the subject of aviation but the intensity of their passion in battling for constituency and other causes that they have espoused. Some have taken a last bow, at least for the time being, on the Bill today —my hon. Friends the Members for Saffron Walden (Mr. Haselhurst), for Hayes and Harlington (Mr. Dicks), for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker) and for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. King), to name but four—and there have been new arrivals in the form of my hon. Friends the Members for Southampton, Test (Mr. Hill) and for Luton, North (Mr. Carlisle). Their contributions have been most welcome.

I can tell the House that the results of those efforts by my hon. Friends have manifested themselves in amendment, and, indeed, improvement of the Bill. My hon. Friend the Member for Saffron Walden was generous enough to mention one of them, although it has to be said that some of my hon. Friends will say that the process has not gone far enough. In doing so, they may themselves underestimate the impact that they have made.

I shall deal briefly with one or two specific points that were raised. The right hon. Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe (Mr. Morris) and his hon. Friend the Member for Stretford (Mr. Lloyd) claimed that we were carrying our some sort of vendetta against Manchester, and that all the licences were despite us rather than because of us. They mentioned, in particular, the question of Singapore Airlines. The formal request of the Singapore Government for access to Manchester was not received until mid-March 1985. Official consultations were held at the beginning of May, at which agreement was reached for the services to start on 1 April 1986. That additional time was needed for the company to make local arrangements and decide on the routeing for its new services. I hope that hon. Members will spend as much time lobbying foreign Governments to let in our airlines as they claim to lobby on behalf of foreign airlines to allow them to come into our airports.

I have two things to say to my hon. Friend the Member for Luton, North. We will be flexible about the debt-equity ratios at airports, but perhaps I might write to him on what would be a complex matter to cover tonight. Councillors who are directors will be able to discuss airport matters but not to vote on specific matters concerning contracts, which seems to be a reasonable compromise.

The Bill that the House now has before it opens the way to the privatisation of Britain's major airports. As such it is a further manifestation of what this Government mean by full and genuine public ownership—the possession of shares and rights in public companies by employees and by the greatest possible number of individual members of the public.

The airports over which the Government currently have direct control and ownership and which they therefore have the right to sell to the public are the seven British Airports Authority airports. Those we shall sell as separate companies under one holding company,. In selling these companies, we shall use every marketing method that we can to help us to reach the widest public.

We are confident that the owners of the 16 local authority airports covered by the terms of the Bill will increasingly see the benefits of introducing private capital.

Finance for development, employee participation, management incentives and, if over 51 per cent. of the shares are sold, loss of public sector capital controls are four benefits which spring immediately to mind. Indeed, the hon. Member for Aberdeen, North (Mr. Hughes) raised that specific point. He wondered whether it was unfair that, while they remained in the public sector, they should have those controls. We do not accept that. They have the public sector guarantee behind them, which distinguishes them in the public sector. If they come out of the public sector, they will reap the benefits of privatisation.

Concern has been expressed about the controls once the airports are in the private sector. I give the House the assurance once more that economic and anti-monopolistic regulation will ensure that the new public airport companies do not act anti-competitively and against the public interest.

We have also taken or retained powers to protect the interests of the state in matters of security with respect to the impact made by the operations of the airports on the environment. On the latter point, I would say to the House that we totally accept that a Government as successful as this Government have been in pursuing the interests of aviation—to the point where our international airports are the busiest in the world, where Manchester airport alone is one of the largest in Europe and where our airlines are collectively the most successful outside the United States—a Government with these achievements to their credit, are bound to be highly sensitive to the environmental impact of this growth and success.

That explains in large measure why, at those airports where we have taken direct powers over noise abatement, we are engaged in major reviews of aircraft track keeping, monitoring methods, noise abatement procedures, night restrictions, noise insulation policies and also the noise indices that were mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Twickenham (Mr. Jessel). Should the need arise, we shall be able to extend those powers to any airport.

This Airports Bill, to which I now ask the House to give a Third Reading, will, I am sure, prove to be a historic milestone for this country. The privatisation of utilities, such as major airports, will be no mean feat. It would seem that we are now to be followed by other countries, notably the United States of America.

Question put, That the Bill be now read the Third time:—

Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. Michael Neubert and
Mr. Francis Maude.

Question accordingly negatived.

Bill immediately considered in Committee.

The Chairman of Ways and Means (Mr. Harold Walker): My attention has been drawn to the fact that the name of the hon. Member for Crawley (Mr. Soames) has been mistakenly printed as a supporter of new clauses 3, 4 and 5 instead of the name of the hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman).

Clauses 1 to 10 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 11

EXTENSION OF POWER TO MAKE CUSTODIAL ORDERS IN RELATION TO CIVILIANS

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the clause stand part of the Bill.

Mr. James Wallace (Orkney and Shetland): I oppose the clause and urge the Committee to vote against it. Its purpose is to lower from 17 to 15 the age limit of male offenders upon whom a court martial or standing civilian court can impose a custodial sentence. There appears to be sexism in the clause. We are told that one of the reasons why girls are not included is the absence of a suitable institution for girls in the 15 to 17 age group. The memorandum submitted to the Select Committee by the Ministry of Defence indicated that there was a feeling against the appropriateness of custodial sentences for girls under the age of 17, although at no stage was substantive evidence given to back up that allegation.

One of the main reasons for the clause may be to bring military law into line with the provisions of the Criminal Justice Act 1982. When the matter was discussed by the Select Committee, the civil servants who appeared before it were unable to answer without notice whether the proposal would bring military law into line with Scottish criminal law. I accept that there is merit in bringing military law into line with general civilian law, but in this case the arguments have not been particularly well made out. First, I do not believe that a court martial is necessarily the best place for such a sentence to be imposed. In the Armed Forces Act 1981 power was given to enable a court martial to sentence young service men to detention in a corrective institution. In paragraph 7 of its report on that legislation, the Select Committee queried "whether a court-martial, in sentencing a young offender . . . would enjoy as full an understanding of the background to the offender's case as a civil court."

Mr. Gerald Bermingham (St. Helens, South): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that when juveniles—those aged 15 to 17—come before a civilian court, there is a specially empanelled bench trained to deal with such juvenile offenders? Does he also agree that to make a 15-year-old boy appear before a general, a brigadier and a couple of colonels is an obscenity?

Mr. Wallace: I share the hon. Gentleman's view. Not only is the composition of the court undesirable for a person of that age, but a court martial is under no duty to have regard to social inquiry reports. The safeguards which are required when young children face sentences in civilian courts are not required in a court martial. It is a retrograde step that military law should impose custodial sentences at a time when there are moves towards greater emphasis on care orders for young people under 17.

In Scotland, almost invariably a young person under 16 will be dealt with at a children's hearing, where the welfare of the child will be paramount. In England, from the time of the Children and Young Persons Act 1969, we have moved towards phasing out custodial sentences for children under 17. There is currently under departmental consideration a report which emphasises moving away from custodial sentences towards the concept of care orders. Therefore, it is wrong that in military law we should be retreating to the era of custodial sentences.

7.30 pm

The case put forward by the Ministry of Defence in this regard would have been stronger if it could have proved from experience some need for the power which it is seeking to give to courts martial and standing civilian courts. But, as was borne out in the Committee, the number of cases where that argument might have been used over the past three or four years is minuscule: one in 1983, two in 1982, one in 1981 and two in 1980. We are not talking of serious offences, such as rape, murder, arson or manslaughter. Almost invariably they would lead to the return of the accused person to the United Kingdom to be dealt with by the civilian courts here.

Those who gave evidence to the Committee had great difficulty in postulating circumstances in which the custodial sentence might be appropriate. Indeed, the type of serious offences with which, with some lack of conviction, they eventually came up seemed wholly inconsistent with a custodial sentence which, under the provisions of this clause, would have a maximum duration of 12 months. The other argument put forward was that the penalty available at the moment—a reception order—could result in young people being kept in care until their 18th or 19th birthday alongside children who were in care for purely social reasons and that this mix is apparently undesirable. There is nothing in the clause which takes away the reception order, so we shall still have cases where the two groups of young people live side by side. Certainly no case was ever made out that the one or two exceptions over the past three or four years would in any respect disturb these institutions, and certainly no evidence was ever brought forward to substantiate that.

The other reason why I feel particularly strongly about this matter is that it appears to pay scant regard to the separate provisions relating to juvenile justice north of the border.

One thing that is welcome is the amendment made in Committee with regard to clause 11(3), which took account of changes in the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) (Scotland) Act 1985. I am sure that if the Commitee deletes this clause, the Minister will find means in another place of bringing back the two amendments relating to children between the ages of 17 and 21.

In Scotland, there are circumstances in which a custodial sentence can be imposed on a young person under the age of 17, but they are very rare. The sentence would be that he may be detained for a period set by the court and in such a place and in such conditions as are directed by the Secretary of State for Scotland. That would happen only in the rare event of a child having been convicted by the court on indictment. The offence must be of an exceptionally serious character, such as would in any event be sent back to the United Kingdom for trial, or where, for example, an appropriate penalty cannot be imposed by a children's hearing — for example, disqualification for driving. It is certainly not envisaged that children under the age of 16 will regularly be brought before the criminal courts of Scotland. Indeed, the Lord Advocate must give express instructions before that can happen. That safeguard is not present in connection with this clause, under which a custodial sentence can be imposed. Furthermore, the court, before imposing a custodial sentence, must be assured that there is no other satisfactory method of disposal. As far as I can see, that qualification is not inserted here either.

Even then, if a child has been brought before the High Court or the sheriff court and been convicted, the court has power under the Scottish criminal procedure to remit to a children's hearing for disposal. Again, that would not apply. In fact, the provisions imposed by this clause weaken the Scottish input compared with what happens at the moment. At present, after a reception order has been made and a child has been received into care by a local authority in England or Wales nominated by the Secretary of State, if that local authority thinks it more appropriate that the child's case should be dealt with in Scotland, it can send the case, under paragraph 8 of schedule 5A to the Army Act 1955 or the equivalent provisions of the Naval Discipline Act and the Air Force Act, to an appropriate Scottish local authority, where it will be dealt with by the children's panel.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): Would not a Scottish service man be dealt with far more advantageously under Scottish law? Is it not an exaggeration to say that these proposals are against our law?

Mr. Wallace: The hon. Member is right. The whole concept of juvenile justice in Scotland is different from that south of the border. This provision runs wholly counter to the ethos and spirit of Scottish juvenile justice, and, indeed, it weakens what is already there. At present, if there is a reception order, a child of Scottish domicile can end up before an appropriate children's hearing. But if a custodial order is imposed under the new power, that possibility will no longer be available; it will be circumvented.

As a matter of interest, the Judge Advocate General, Mr. Stuart-Smith, at page 56 of the Select Committee report, said:

"the policy, as I understand it, and the belief has always been that it is, where possible, generally preferable that people of our own country should be tried according to the system of law which they understand in a language which is their own, and that might perhaps be thought the more preferable if it is a juvenile."

Why should someone who has had no connection with England suddenly find himself subject to an alien system of law? If the clause goes through, it will cut off even the one line back to the Scottish system which now exists. An examination of the Scottish system and what happens to a child underlines the inappropriateness of what is proposed in the clause.

What kind of disposal is meant by imprisonment? Clause 11(3)(i) says:

"if the offender is a male person who is under the age of 16 years, such place as the Secretary of State may direct".

What kind of places are open? Imprisonment is inappropriate for a person under the age of 21. A court may not impose a sentence of detention at either a detention centre or a young offenders' institution on someone under the age of 16. Clearly, the legislature has thought it inappropriate that children under the age of 16 should go to such institutions. If it were to be one of those institutions to which the Secretary of State decided to send him, I submit that it would be an inappropriate sentence. Alternatively, the Secretary of State might direct that the child be sent to a place of residential care, or a list D school, where he could be side by side with other children who are there not for criminal but for social reasons—the very thing that the Ministry of Defence says it is trying to avoid. That only underlines how ill-thought-out and unnecessary this provision is.

Having regard to the trend towards care orders and also the very few cases and the lack of almost any need for this power, I hope that the House will reject the clause.

The Minister of State for the Armed Forces (Mr. John Stanley): The hon. Gentleman has repeated in Committee of the whole House much of what he said in Committee and he touches on a matter which no doubt the Committee will touch on later when we come to consider the various amendments tabled by the hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman) in relation to child care procedures.

As the Committee well knows, in this area of law and in many other aspects of social law, there are differences between the provisions of English and Scottish law. Far be it from me, as a non-lawyer, to adjudicate as to the relative merits of the two. I entirely understand the strength of feeling of Members of the House from Scotland who feel that their law is superior to English law. The dilemma facing the Government is that, as far as possible, they must produce an approximation under the Armed Forces legislation to what is already on the statute book for the civil community.

The Committee will be aware that the clause gives service courts the power to impose custodial orders of up to 12 months on young males of 15 and 16 on the same lines as are provided to the criminal courts under the Criminal Justice Act 1982. That legislation was, of course, carefully considered and approved by the House. When we considered the equivalent situation in relation to this Bill, it seemed right to bring the Armed Forces legislation into line with provisions in that Act.

Although I agree with the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace) that we are talking about a very small number of cases where young men of 15 and 16 would commit such crimes as might require custodial sentences, the service authorities feel that there should be an appropriate penalty on the statute book. Thus, given the provisions in the 1982 Act, I must ask the Committee to accept that the clause should stand part of the Bill.

Mr. Dalyell: Before the Minister sits down, perhaps he could help the Committee. I have no intention of trying to catch him out, and it would not be right to take advantage of a non-lawyer. But this is a real point in relation to Scots law. Is it not reasonable to ask for a letter or comment from the Lord Advocate or the Solicitor-General, as I sincerely believe that what we are doing contravenes Scots law?

Mr. Bermingham: I had the dubious privilege of serving on this Select Committee. I put it that way with great sadness but it is a matter of record that I walked out in frustration and annoyance. I have served on many Standing Committees and I have served on a Select Committee since I came to the House. The object of a Select Committee is to investigate. Many of the points that the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace) raised this evening were put to witnesses in Committee. He, like me, suffered on occasions from the "choke off" system. That is when one is "choked off" in the middle of a set of questions because the majority party felt that those of us who were in the minority party did not have the right to ask such questions.

The Committee was conducted in an absolutely disgraceful way. When the Question was put on whether a witness should be heard, we were outvoted on straight party lines. At that point I decided that I had had enough, and I did not attend a single sitting thereafter. Tonight we shall try again to bring a little sanity to the Bill. We get the chance only once every five years.

I shall keep within the parameters of the clause, because my remarks are pertinent to it. The hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland kindly allowed me to intervene during his speech, when he spoke about incarceration. I tried to make the same point by questioning witnesses and moving amendments. Of course all the Opposition amendments automatically fell. However, as in other Committees, the voice of the Opposition is listened to, and worthwhile points are taken on board, although they may be amended. However, I say to the Minister as kindly as I can that in that Committee it was a waste of time to try to make a point. No matter how reasonable it was, we found that we were not listened to. On clause 11 we had the first of the classic examples of that. We are talking about one or two or perhaps three cases at the most in a year. We are talking about putting children before service courts and incarcerating 15-year-old boys for up to one year. I leave aside the question of girls because there are no places for them. If there were, however, I am sure that this Government would try to incarcerate them. [Interruption.] I hear the hon. Gentleman make a comment.

If he had attended the Committee he would know what we are talking about and he would have heard the evidence against us and the comments we to have put up with. A very important principle is involved here. We are trying to equate in our society the position of the volunteer with that of the civilian. Regrettably, the volunteer in our society is now becoming almost the victim of backwoodsmen-thinking. What is the purpose of seeking to imprison? Of course, if one puts the right to imprison on the statute book some court-martial somewhere will imprison as quickly as it can. It is one more bullet and whereas there have only been one or two cases in the past few years I guarantee that Scots boys of 15 or 16 will find themselves in English detention centres or gaols 'ere 12 months is out.

I make this plea from the heart to the Minister. Let not once again deafness reign in the Government ranks. For once may the voice of the Opposition and the comments we have to make be listened to. Many will be made from long experience. Perhaps then we shall get some movement on this Bill. What we have had to date on clause 11 and other matters has been almost contempt for the voice of the Opposition.

Mr. Dalyell: I thought it might be useful, before the Bill goes to the Lords, to get some comment from the Lord Advocate.

7.45 pm

Mr. Stanley: All I can say to the hon. Gentleman is that the drafting of these provisions was carried out in close consultation with the Scottish Office and it is wholly familiar with these provisions and this reflects the collective position of the whole Government.

Question put, That the clause stand part of the Bill:

Clause 12 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 13

CHANGE OF PLACE OF SAFETY AND RETURN TO UNITED KINGDOM OF CHILDREN IN NEED OF CARE OR CONTROL

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): I beg to move amendment No. 1, in page 14, line 23, at end add—

'(7) In section 14 of the Armed Forces Act 1981, for subsection (4) there shall be substituted the following subsection—

"(4) The grounds which justify the making of such an order are that there is reasonable cause to believe that damage to the child's health or well-being is likely unless he is immediately removed to or detained in a place of protection for the duration of the order.".'.

The Chairman: With this it will be convenient to take the following amendments: No. 2, in page 14, line 23, at end add—

'(7) In section 14 of the Armed Forces Act 1981 there shall be inserted the following subsection—

"(6A) (a) for the purpose of any hearing at which an order under this section is being sought, the officer, who under subsections (5) and (6) above has the power to make the order, may insist that person be nominated to protect and represent the interests of the child at any hearing.

(b) A person nominated under paragraph (a) above shall be described as the 'safeguarder' of the child.".'.

No. 3, in page 14, line 23, at end add—

'(7) In section 14 of the Armed Forces Act 1981, after subsection (9) there shall be inserted the following subsection—

"(9A) An officer making an order under this section shall have power to authorise the withholding of the childs' address and of access, and to specify the conditions on which access should be granted.".'.

No. 4, in page 14, line 23, at end add—

'(7) In section 14 of the Armed Forces Act 1981 there shall be added at the end the following subsection—

"(12) (a) At any hearing overseas or in the UK at which an order under this section is being sought, the parent or parents shall have the right to attend and to nominate a representative to attend on their behalf.

(b) The parent or parents or their nominated representative shall have the right to appeal against an order made under this section on their child".'.

No. 5, in page 14, line 23, at end add—

'(7) In section 14 of the Armed Forces Act 1981, there shall be added the following subsection—

"(12) (a) Written statements supporting an application to be made under this section should be provided at the hearing where practicable, or in any case within 12 hours of the order being made. The officers making the order must record in writing his reasons for doing so.

(b) The written application and the reasons for the order should be supplied after the hearing by the applicant to the parents and the child, and the parents should be given information by the officer presiding about their right to seek legal advice.".'.

Dr. Godman: I am deeply interested in the detection, prevention and treatment of child abuse, which is a crucial issue even if only a handful of cases each year is involved. As I said once in Committee, there was only one Jasmine Beckford, and that little girl, because of negligence and other reasons, is now dead. With the amendments, I seek to strengthen the position of a child who, regrettably, is unfortunately placed at the centre of an application for a place of safety order.

Amendments Nos. 1, 3, 4 and 5 strengthen amendment No. 2 which is concerned principally with the child's interests. I hope that it is in order for me to say at this point that I shall seek a Division on amendment No. 2. The interests of the child or children should be given primacy over the interests of all others. I believe that the Government are reluctant to accept the amendments.

8 pm

The 1981 report of the Armed Forces Bill Select Committee rightly paid close regard to the serious problems surrounding children at risk. Paragraph 10 on page 6 of the report stated:

"The grounds on which an order may be made (e.g. that the child is being ill-treated, exposed to moral danger, or beyond control) follow civil legislation."

That is what the Minister suggested when he said that in military law the Government sought an approximation to extant law in the United Kingdom. The Committee continued:

"One lacuna, however, in its likely operation came to light in the course of evidence taken from the Ministry of Defence. Unlike Clause 13, the Clause contains no provisions regulating the return to the United Kingdom of children affected by it once the short-term holding orders have run their course. It is envisaged that, if the most secure future for a child is adjudged to be within the care of a United Kingdom local authority, then the child's family would be returned administratively to the UK, whereupon the child could be taken into care under English law."

I am not happy with that reference to English law. If nothing else, it reveals a lamentable ignorance of Scottish law in terms of the detection, prevention and treatment of child abuse. In fairness, I should point out that there were no Scottish Members on that Committee—the members were all from south of the border. In fairness to the Government, I point out that clause 13 is to be welcomed, albeit with serious reservations—hence the amendments.

The report of the Armed Forces Bill Select Committee, which was published yesterday, dealt with the need to defend and promote the interests of children in cases of child abuse. This time the Committee acknowledged the difference between Scots law and practices and English law and practices in the detection and treatment of child abuse. The Committee was made aware of those highly significant differences by the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace) and myself.

Mr. Gordon Wilson (Dundee, East): A powerful combination.

Dr. Godman: The report by the Armed Forces Bill Select Committee has a bearing on amendments Nos. 2, 3, 4 and 5. Paragraph 16 on pages viii and ix states:

"The procedures under service law for dealing with children at risk are broadly comparable to those under English civilian law. Different procedures, however, operate in Scotland. Under Scots law, a child detained in a place of safety must be brought before a 'children's hearing', composed of 3 lay members, within 1 or 2 days. The hearing has power to appoint a 'safeguarder' to represent the child's interests."

I used that phrase in one of my amendments. The paragraph continues:

"Both the child and its parents have the right to be represented at the hearing, and to appeal against the hearing's decision. These various safeguards for both the child and its parents do not exist in English law or, consequently, in military law."

My amendment seeks "an approximation"—to use the Minister's words — to Scots civilian law rather than English civilian law. The report continues:

"The Committee accept that the special circumstances of service life overseas may make it difficult for a full range of safeguards on the Scots model to be built into the system for dealing with children at risk. Nonetheless, we recommend that the MoD consider whether it would not be possible to extend to military law some at least of the relevant provisions of Scots law, in order better to protect the interests of children and parents."

That is precisely what my amendment seeks to accomplish.

As I said to the Select Committee, Scots law is superior to English law. I make no apology for that statement. It is easier for me to say that than it is for the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland, because I am a Yorkshire man who has been domiciled for a long time in Scotland and who had the good sense to marry a Scots girl. I can say with no false modesty that Scots law is superior with respect to the detection, prevention and treatment of child abuse.

Amendment No. 1 closely follows a recommendation of the review of child care law, which was a report to Ministers by an interdepartmental working party which was published last year. Paragraph 13.8 on page 86 of that excellent report stated:

"We are concerned that the present grounds for an order do not address the purpose of removing the child. Further, by expressly referring to the grounds for care proceedings in section 1(2) of the 1969 Act"—

an English Act—

"the wording of section 28(1) might have contributed to the frequent use of place of safety orders as a means of starting care proceedings. An emergency protection order should not become a matter of course"— that is the term used instead of a place of safety order—

"where care proceedings are a likely option. We recommend that the grounds for such an order should be that if the child is not removed or detained now he is likely to suffer harm. Put another way, the child must be at risk of damage to his health or well-being which necessitates his immediate removal or detention for a brief period."

The report goes on to say in paragraph 13.10:

"We are aware that our suggested grounds . . . concentrate on apprehended harm to the child. This is consistent with the rationale for an emergency order. The prospective grounds clearly increase the risk of unwarranted intervention. However, we would limit intervention to cases where it is necessary to make the order for the period in question, so that the order is precisely addressed to the needs of the children."

The report was discussing English law. It went on:

"Further, the magistrate should be satisfied that there is reasonable cause to believe that such harm is likely to the child. This is a stricter test than the present requirement that the court be satisfied that the applicant has reasonable cause to believe that certain conditions exist. Finally we consider that the word 'likely' places a sufficiently difficult burden of proof on the applicant to prevent unwarranted orders."

Those two paragraphs from that fine report substantiate the argument for amendment No. 1.

In that context — I promise that this is the last quotation from that report—paragraph 13.11 says:

"It is not for us to suggest the exact wording of new grounds. However the present wording of the power to 'detain and take' the child to a place of safety causes problems in practice. Some magistrates may be reluctant to grant orders for children who are in hospital, since they do not need to be 'taken' to a place of protection, even though detention may be in their interests. Revised grounds should enable such children to be made subject to an order if they are at risk of harm."

I do not want to take up too much time so I shall now deal with amendment No. 2, which I think is the linchpin of these amendments. The amendment seeks to employ Scots law and Scottish practices in order better to protect the interests of the child or children concerned. Let me remind the House that where an applicant — for example, a police officer or social worker — believes that a child has been physically or sexually abused he may seek to place all of the children in the family in care. Most of the emphasis in discussions and debates of this kind concentrates on the child. However, the social worker, policeman or perhaps the paediatrician who has examined a child for non-accidental injuries may urge the taking into safety of all of the children in the family.

8.15 pm

In Scotland, we have what are known as children's hearings. They play a decisive role in combating the social evil of child abuse. The children's panel or hearings were set up under the provisions of the Social Work (Scotland) Act 1968 and amending legislation under a Conservative Government. Under English law the child has no right to be represented at hearings. Under Scottish law — I am using a document which was kindly provided to Members of the Committee by the Ministry of Defence — the child has a right to be represented before the children's hearing. The panels are comprised of three lay persons plus a reporter. The reporters are employed by the regional and island councils but they cannot be dismissed other than by the Secretary of State for Scotland. Therefore, there are safeguards for the children and the parents. In addition to the right to be represented at a hearing the document says:

"where the panel"—

it means the hearing—

"considers that there is a conflict between the interests of the child and those of his parents, the panel may appoint a 'safeguarder' to represent the child's interests."

That is an important development in the process of dealing with child abuse. That is why I have used the term in amendment No. 2.

In Scotland a safeguarder may be a retired social worker. On our list of safeguarders in the Strathclyde region we have Miss Vera Hiddleston who is the head of the social work training unit at the Jordanhill college of education. She is a vastly experienced specialist in this field. It is such people who can be appointed by a children's hearing to act as the safeguarder of the child.

Time is against me so I shall conclude my remarks on amendment No. 2 by urging the Committee to accept, apart from all else, that the amendment is presented with sincerity and in good faith. As I said earlier, and I am willing to repeat it, in this case the law north of the border is better than that south of the border.

Amendment No. 3 seeks to protect the child, or children, and their caretakers. Let me give an example. If a child of less than five years was removed from his parents stationed in, for example, Osnabruck, and returned to the Strathclyde region in Scotland, no one will tell me that such a child would be returned to England. He would be placed with foster parents. No child being taken into care in the Strathclyde region goes anywhere other than to foster parents. Such foster parents are most carefully selected by the social work department in Strathclyde. It may well be that there are all kinds of risks involved here, not only to the child but to the foster parents. Therefore, it is important that the authorities and officers concerned have the right to refuse access and to refuse to disclose the whereabouts of such a child. At the same time we should remember the wise words of the working party on child care law:

"If the applicant is other than a local authority, he should inform the relevant authority of the order, the child's address and who has the charge of the child at that address, and whether access is to be granted. Local authorities should have to satisfy themselves of the welfare of the child under the order, including the arrangements for access."

Those are recommendations in the report, but it is established practice in Scotland.

"They should be able to apply for the emergency order"—

the place of safety order—

"to be transferred to them from the applicant if transfer would be in the child's interests. The local authority should continue to be under a duty to pay the expenses of the person providing the place of protection (section 73(2) of the 1980 Act)."

Amendment No. 4 is concerned with the rights of parents. I think that it is only right and proper that the interests of the child should always take priority, but we have also to pay close and serious regard to the rights of the parents. Let me remind the House that, in many cases of child abuse — physical or sexual — only one of the parents is involved. The husband and father or cohabitee may subject the mother and child or children to physical abuse of the most violent kind. In such cases, why should the mother suffer? Why should the mother be separated from her child or children? In cases such as this the applicant may recommend that all the children should be taken into care. Why should the mother be torn apart from her family in such circumstances?

The objective in child care law — it surely coincides with Conservative party philosophy — is the maintenance of the family as an integrated unit. The mother must have her rights protected and promoted by those in authority especially in the dreadful circumstances in which a woman may find herself.

In support of the amendment I quote, with modesty, an amendment that was proposed by the hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow to the report of the Select Committee on the Armed Forces Bill, but which Government Members of the Committee chose to vote down:

"There is, however, a need for parents to have an opportunity to be heard and to be supported by a representative at a hearing where the decision as to whether or not to return the child to the United Kingdom is made. If a decision is made to return the child to the United Kingdom, then there would need to be safeguards both to protect the child's welfare and to ensure that parents can attend and be represented at a court hearing in the United Kingdom. The Report to Ministers of an interdepartmental working group on English Child Care Law regards as unsatisfactory the present procedure under English law whereby only the child and the applicant are parties to care proceedings".

I found that appalling and that was why I moved the amendment. The amendment continues:

"The Report recommends that under a new law parents should be parties to proceedings. It is our view that this reflects a sensible and humane approach to a most serious problem . We therefore recommend that military law concerned with children at risk should take cognisance of the Report's recommendations in this regard."

I regret to say that that amendment was lost.

Amendment 5 also seeks to protect the interests of the parents. I make no apology for returning once more to the interdepartmental report. If one studies the wording of the amendment, one appreciates that the quotation from paragraph 14.20 on page 98 of the report is apposite:

"The court . . . should be under a duty to serve notice of the proceedings on the "parents" . . .anyone with charge or control of the child (this would include foster parents); and anyone with whom the child has had his home for six weeks or more within the six months preceding the application. In addition, it should have a discretion to serve notice on any other person who has or may have an interest in the proceedings and wishes to participate in them".

Taken together, amendments Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4 and 5 seek to strengthen the position of both the child and the parents. However amendment No. 2 is primus inter pares—it has to be. The child's interests and welfare, present and fuure, must always, whether we are discussing a family stationed in Osnabruck or a family in Greenock and Port Glasgow, be given priority. I suggest, with humility, to this Committee that my amendment will strengthen clause 13 in the new Bill. It will bring about an approximation to military law to Scots law—Scots law at its finest, Scots child care law.

Mr. Wilson: I wish to speak in favour of the amendments put forward by the hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman). I do so largely because of the excellent way in which he has put them forward. I have not had the experience of serving on the Select Committee on the Armed Forces Bill and therefore I come fairly fresh to the subject and to the legislation. I have had some experience of child law in my past career.

I do not necessarily share the view of the hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow in adopting, or seeking to put forward, amendments to the Armed Forces Bill to bring the law of England into line with the law of Scotland. I can accept his argument about the superiority of the Scottish law, but I would not necessarily show the same degree of humility as I am both a Scottish Nationalist and a Scottish lawyer to boot.

I wish to raise another serious principle which is bound up with the terms of these amendments and the Bill as it is to be framed. England is displaying imperialism in seeking to impose upon Scotland any part of the English law. It is an entrenched part of the Treaty of Union that Scotland would not have imposed upon it any part of the law of England. Regardless of that international treaty, which the House has broken time and time again, provisions have been adopted which put the Scots at a disadvantage. It is a constitutional right that the Scots should be exposed to their own legal system and should not, whether it is inferior or superior, have any provisions of an alien legal system imposed upon them. It does not matter whether someone is serving with the armed forces or is a civilian. It is utterly wrong that, as citizens, such provisions should be imposed upon them.

I concede that there may be special arguments concerning the fact that service personnel are volunteers and are alleged to serve in the United Kingdom, not the English armed forces. Thus it could be argued that they have consented to accept the English legal system. Nevertheless, it cannot be accepted under any circumstances that any spouse or child or service personnel should have their birthright, the Scots legal system, removed from them.

I support the hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow in terms which may cause him some embarrassment. It is the constitutional right of Scots to live under their own legal system. The fact that one person may serve in the armed forces does not give any Government or the House authority, in terms of the Treaty of Union, to dilute the privileges to which they are entitled by domicile and birth.

If it is correct that the child, or indeed the parents, may not be entitled to representation in connection with the proceedings that may be taken under the Bill, I would argue that that is in defiance of natural justice. I should be interested to hear the Minister's reply. It is an essential part of human rights that we are entitled to representation. No decision should be taken in secret or taken apart from one party or another.

If I follow the case presented by the hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow, the Scottish system confers those rights. If, under the Bill, the British system does not provide those essential rights, perhaps it is time somebody raised the matter with the European Court of Human Rights at Strasbourg. Obviously, it is no surprise to me that Britain has been hauled before that court more frequently than any other member of the European Community for a lack of constitutional protection of rights which are safeguarded to nationals of other countries. It seems wrong that such a right should be denied, and I accept what the hon. Gentleman said about that. If what he says is correct, I am both shocked and alarmed that those rights of natural justice should not be afforded under the legislation.

For that reason, if not for the vital constitutional provision that I mentioned, I hope that the Minister will ensure that no Scottish citizen is deprived of his legal rights under the Scottish legal code.

8.30 pm

Mr. Stanley: I certainly appreciate the detailed and expert consideration that the hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman) has brought to this aspect of the Bill throughout our proceedings both in Committee and on the Floor of the House tonight. As he acknowledged, the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace) has also made a considerable contribution.

I appreciate the fact that the hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow tabled his amendments early, as I certainly wish to consider them carefully. I hope that he will be able to conclude from my response that, although for the reasons that I shall endeavour to explain I cannot meet him in all respects, we have taken his amendments seriously and made a proper, considered response to them.

The hon. Member for Dundee, East (Mr. Wilson) made a characteristically powerful, anti-imperialist speech. I wonder whether, if clause 13 had been based entirely on Scots law, he would have made exactly the same speech. As a lawyer, I wish to make a simple practical point to him. I hope that he will recognise as a lawyer that it is only possible and sensible for the services to administer their disciplinary legislation in the context often of small groups, units, battalions, and sometimes even smaller groups that may be posted overseas, on the basis of a single corpus of law. It would not be practical to provide within a single unit the operation of, for example, Scots law and English law simultaneously in relation to the same offence. Having said that, I hope that the best points of both English and Scots law can be combined in legislation. We in the armed services would certainly wish to follow the best legislation that can be put together.

Mr. Wilson: I am grateful to the Minister for that assurance, but it is always strange to me that the code of law which seems to be adopted to deal with the armed forces comes purely from the English common law, and that little Scots law is borrowed, especially regarding the identification, representation and statements made under the criminal law as it may apply to courts martial. Will the Minister explain why Scots law is never adopted as the major code, and why we always seem to rely on English law in these matters?

Mr. Stanley: In this area we tend to take the lead from the Department of Health and Social Security. I am sure that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State makes a careful study of what happens regarding the same social problems north of the border when he makes amendments to legislation. I am sure he wishes to come up with the most satisfactory legislative solutions.

Mr. Wilson: I am not reassured by that. I have on-going correspondence with the Treasury and the DHSS both of which refuse to admit the differences in majority and the rights of young people from the age of 16 onwards. They, too, follow the English pattern.

Mr. Stanley: I note what the hon. Gentleman says, and I am relieved that that correspondence is not with me.

I should like to deal with each of the important amendments in turn. Regarding amendment No. 1, the present wording of section 14(4) of the Armed Forces Act 1981, which the hon. Gentleman seeks to amend, deliberately follows that of section 1 of the Children and Young Persons Act 1969 which applies to England and Wales. I hope that the House will agree that in such matters it is right and proper that the services should adopt the same criteria, and work to the same principles in deciding whether a child should be removed to a place of safety as those which would apply were the case being considered by civil authorities under the equivalent civil legislation.

The hon. Gentleman's proposed amendment would remove that commonality with civil child care legislation in England and Wales, and substitute different criteria, which, for example, would make it difficult to remove a child beyond the control of his parents to a place of safety.

Mr. Bermingham rose——

Mr. Stanley: I shall give way, but it may be helpful if I conclude my remarks on amendment No. 1.

Obviously, I appreciate that the equivalent Scottish legislation, which is section 37(2) of the Social work (Scotland) Act 1968, contains no provision for a place of safety order where the child is beyond the control of his parents. I am also aware that a Scottish hon. Member—indeed, this evening we have already seen this—is unlikely to be impressed with the merits of English and Welsh legislation, compared with equivalent Scottish legislation, although he will perhaps draw some comfort from the fact that the Children and Young Persons Act 1969 was of course the work of a previous Labour Government.

The hon. Gentleman will, however, be aware that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services is conducting a review of child care law. I am sure that the differences between the law in Scotland and in England and Wales on this point will be carefully considered. Should my right hon. Friend decide to amend the Children and Young Persons Act on that point, I am sure that we would want to consider appropriate amendments to the armed forces legislation.

Meanwhile, I hope the hon. Gentleman will understand that I do not feel it would be right for me to anticipate the outcome of my right hon. Friend's review and embark on a piecemeal amendment of these provisions in the armed forces legislation. For those reasons I am afraid that I am not able to accept amendment No. 1.

Mr. Bermingham: While I listened with care to the Minister's remarks and understand that, if further amendments to the law are carried, it is possibly pre-emptive at this stage to amend the law in anticipation of what might or might not happen, does the Minister agree that it may be necessary for the Ministry to take on board the consideration of a child's position in being returned to Scotland as opposed to England because in Scotland a child has certain rights which he would not have in England? If the Minister will undertake to consider that matter, it may assist my hon. Friend the Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman) with his amendments, without having to press them to a vote.

Mr. Stanley: As I understand it, in the normal course of events a Scottish child would be returned to Scotland and be dealt with under Scottish legislation.

Mr. Kevin McNamara (Kingston upon Hull, North): The right hon. Gentleman made an interesting point about the review by the Secretary of State for Social Services. Can he undertake that, if legislation is introduced, it will be so phrased that this legislation will automatically be amended? We will not then have to wait three or four years for suitable alterations to be made in the next quinquennial review.

Mr. Stanley: In answering that question, one becomes involved in the issue of the scope of legislation that is at the moment entirely hypothetical. I cannot give an undertaking such as the hon. Gentleman asks for. I can, however, assure him that we are anxious that in all aspects of legislation, and especially the sensitive and important area of social legislation, service legislation should be up to the civil standard and should reflect the latest thinking of the Government. If it were practical and possible in legislative terms, we would want our legislation to be kept in line with amending legislation that might be produced by another Department. If it were possible to use another Department's Bill to produce an equivalent amendment in our own legislation, we would, in principle, want to do so.

Amendment No. 2 provides for the appointment of what is termed a safeguarder to protect a child's interests at any hearings. This proposal is derived from Scots law on child care. However, in Scots law a safeguarder is not appointed when the initial application is made to the justice of the peace or the sheriff for a place of safety warrant, but only at a later stage, before a children's panel, when the child's longer-term future is being considered —in other words, once care proceedings are under way. However, service law does not deal with care proceedings but only with the temporary removal of the children from danger. The proceedings are equivalent to a place of safety order under English law and to the stage prior to a children's hearing in Scotland.

Just as there is no occasion for the provision of a safeguarder at that stage in either English or Scots civil law, so there is no occasion for such provision at the equivalent stage in service procedure. That is why the clause is drafted as it is. I hope that the hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow, will understand that at the equivalent stage there is no provision for a safeguarder either in Scots or English law.

Mr. Wilson: If the child were at risk while the parents and the child were, for instance, in Hong Kong, and it was necessary for the child to be taken to a place of safety for reasons that we all understand—I accept the Minister's argument — what would happen? Would the child be taken straight back to Scotland if the parents were still based in Hong Kong? At what stage, and under what procedure, would the long-term arrangements for the child's future be taken care of? It is peculiar to take a child away to Scotland to make use of the rights of representation if the parents are still in Hong Kong, yet the Scottish proceedings would not apply in Hong Kong, or under the Army Acts.

Mr. Stanley: The hon. Gentleman refers to the relationship between the short-term and the long-term procedures. I will deal with that on another amendment.

I assume that the intention of amendment No. 3 is that there should be power to withhold details of the whereabouts of the actual place of safety from the parents of the child on whom an order is made, if that is justified.

I should first stress that there are likely to be very few cases indeed, if any, in which such action would be justified. The services are likely in every case to want to reassure parents that their children are in good hands. Of course, where a child has been, or may be, the victim of serious abuse by a parent, it would be important to keep the parent away from the child. In such rare cases commanding officers would invaribly have adminstrative means at their disposal to select a place of safety under service control that would effectively ensure the exclusion of the parent.

The amendment of the hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow would in fact not be consistent with either English or Scots civil law. No powers for withholding a child's address and access to the child have been given either to the magistrate when a place of safety order is granted in England, or to a sheriff in Scotland when an authorisation by a court or justice of the peace is made for the detention of a child in a place of safety pending arrangements for bringing him before a children's hearing.

8.45 pm

The amendment also contains a number of technical deficiencies. For example, it is not made an offence to disclose the child's address, or to make provision for the revocation or variation of orders denying access.

However, I assure the hon. Member that we shall review this matter as part of the reconsideration of section 14 of the 1981 Act that the Select Committee has asked us to undertake, and in the light of any changes that may emerge from the DHSS review of child care legislation to which I have referred.

I know that the laudable intentions of the hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow in amendment No. 4 and the other amendments to clause 13 that he has tabled are to protect as far as possible the interests of both parents and children when place of safety orders are being considered. However, I think that he may have somewhat misunderstood the purpose of the place of safety order provisions in service legislation.

The provisions that the hon. Member envisages for attendance or representation at hearings, and for appeal, are of course entirely appropriate where child care proceedings are being considered, and where the child's longer-term future is at stake. However, section 14 of the Armed Forces Act 1981 does not deal with care proceedings. It deals only with temporary emergency place of safety orders which may only be made overseas — not in the United Kingdom, contrary to the amendment—and which can last for a maximum of 28 days in total.

Such orders are designed primarily to remove children as quickly as possible from a potential source of danger and to provide for their safe keeping until the way ahead is determined. They are thus broadly equivalent to place of safety proceedings in England and Wales or to the stage prior to a children's hearing in Scotland.

The next step might be either to return the child to the family or to transfer him or her to the United Kingdom, into the hands of local welfare authorities which will decide what further action by way of care proceedings might be required. Such further care proceedings would take place under local civil law—either English or Scots law—where the statutory provision as to representation or appeal would apply. The amendment would go far beyond the equivalent provisions affecting the initial granting of a place of safety order in England or Scotland so far as attendance, representation and appeal by parents are concerned.

Service law already goes further than either English or Scots law in providing that parents have a right, wherever practicable, to make representations to the commanding officer before the order is made. It would not be right to go further. To do so would risk delaying proceedings while possibly leaving a child in a dangerous situation. I am sure that that would not be acceptable to the House.

In amendment No. 5, the hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow proposes that there should be written statements supporting applications for a place of safety order. The suggestion derives, perhaps, from a misunderstanding of the type of procedures involved. Service place of safety orders do not involve written applications and formal hearings. They are designed to react swiftly to events where the child is in immediate danger. What usually happens is that a case conference will hastily be convened involving medical staff, social workers and others with knowledge of the family. If they decide that a place of safety order is necessary, a request for such an order will be made to the commanding officer.

What the hon. Gentleman proposes in terms of written applications goes far beyond anything in English child care law or, indeed, in Scots law in relation to the initial application to a justice of the peace or a sheriff. This provision might cause an unacceptable delay in removing a child from the source of danger. Of course, where a child is transferred back to the United Kingdom and after care proceedings are instituted by the local authorities, the services make arrangements to provide all the necessary supporting evidence and documentation to the United Kingdom courts.

However, on another aspect of the amendment, I am sympathetic to the proposal that the officer making the order should record on it his reasons for doing so and the fact that the parents should formally be told of the reasons. In practice, it is most unlikely that parents would be left in ignorance of the reasons, but, having considered this, I have decided that, from now on, as a matter of administrative practice, the officer making the place of safety order should include on the form the grounds on which it is made and a copy of the order should be given to the parents or guardian of the child.

The appropriate service guidelines will be amended accordingly. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will accept that it is practicable to accept the substance of his amendment by the administrative change that I have described.

The hon. Gentleman's amendment also refers to the need to remind parents of their right to seek legal advice. I have decided to accept the substance of the hon. Gentleman's amendment on that point. However, I should explain that the Queen's regulations for each service already contain paragraphs which make it clear that for those serving overseas service lawyers will provide legal advice free of charge on non-criminal matters, including matrimonial and family affairs. By amending the appropriate service guidelines, I shall ensure that, in future, parents whose children are subject to place of safety orders have their attention drawn to the relevant paragraphs of the Queen's regulations.

I hope that, on the basis of what I have said and the responses that I have made, the hon. Gentleman will believe that his amendments — which are important — have been carefully considered. I hope that he believes that this is an acceptable response and that his major anxieties have been met.

Mr. Dalyell: Often in Committee we are a bit curmudgeonly, but I wish to say two things. In my constituency experience, the services, almost without exception, have been sensitive and helpful in handling these difficult matters, and credit is due to the good sense of commanding officers. I very much welcome what the Minister of State said. Some formal notification of the reasons is the answer to the problems that some of us have experienced.

Dr. Godman: I echo the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell). In the rare constituency cases that have arisen concerning the sons of my constituents serving overseas, I have been most grateful for the sensitive care and attention that has been devoted to the parents. I am pleased to put that on the official record.

I hope that I am not whingeing when I say that, unlike my hon. Friend the Member for Dundee, East (Mr. Wilson), I am not a lawyer, so I am a little handicapped. I wish to read what the Minister said, although I assure him that I listened most attentively to his remarks. Nor am I served by the platoon — at times it looked like a battalion — of Ministry of Defence officials who gave evidence to the Select Committee. Much of my experience is based on the good advice and guidance given to me by my wife who, as I told Mr. Fracer of the Ministry of Defence, is a senior social worker and highly experienced in these matters. If I have made any mistakes, they are entirely my responsibility and nothing to do with my wife. My dear wife, who is from Govan, is a little larger than I am.

Although I do not have the benefit of a platoon of specialists, I am grateful for the care and attention that has been given to the amendments. I accept that, in several instances, they are technically inadequate. That can only be blamed on my ignorance of these matters. In the Select Committee, and this evening, I have tried to establish the need to protect the interests of the child. If such dreadful circumstances were to arise in connection with the child of a Scottish soldier, which led to the child being removed from its family, that child must be returned to Scotland — as my hon. Friend the Member for Dundee, East said, to his place of birth or where he and his family are domiciled.

When the Minister dealt with amendment No. 3, he said that a Scottish child would be returned to care in Scotland. Having been given that assurance — I know that the Minister is honourable—I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clauses 13 to 17 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

New Clause 1

COMPOSITION OF COURTS-MARTIAL

'(4) After section 89 of the Army Act 1955 there shall be inserted the following section—

"89A Notwithstanding the provisions of sections 87, 88 and 89 in the case of a general, district, of field general court martial convened to try a person of below commissioned rank, the defendant shall have the right to insist that at least one member of the court-martial is also a person of below commissioned rank.".

(2) After section 89 of the Air Force Act 1955 there shall be inserted the following section—

"89A Notwithstanding the provisions of sections 87, 88 and 89 in the case of a general, district, or field general court martial convened to try a person of below commissioned rank, the defendant shall have the right to insist that at least one member of the court-martial is also a person of below commissioned rank.".

(3) In Section 54 of the Naval Discipline Act 1957, at the end there shall be added the following subsection—

"(9) In the case of a court martial convened to try a person of below commissioned rank, the defendant shall have the right to insist that at least one member of the court-martial is also a person of below commissioned rank.—[Dr. Godman.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Dr. Godman: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

The time has come to change the composition of courts martial where those proceeded against are of non-commissioned rank. In essence, the accused — for example, a sergeant—should have the right if he cares to exercise it to be judged by his peers as well as by his superiors. That is my sincere view and I have subscribed to it for many years.

I should point out that my experience of these matters is severely dated. But I have had the honour as a national service man to serve with that most honourable group of people, the royal military police. Therefore, I have some experience, albeit of a severely dated nature.

Mr. Dalyell: I am not entirely happy about this. One does not want to put it frivolously, but are we sure that we want to put the royal military policeman in that position, let alone the regimental sergeant-major because it might be the RSM or the company sergeant-major who was delegated to that task?

Dr. Godman: That is a pertinent question. I take the point that if the accused who was being proceeded against were to be a member of the Corps of Royal Military Police, I would see—as I say, based on my severely dated experience — no objection being made simply because his peer was a senior non-commissioned officer of the corps. But I take my hon. Friend's point. It is a serious matter.

Mr. Bermingham: I hope that my hon. Friend will not think that I am being in any way facetious when I ask him whether he agrees that, just as a civilian can challenge up to three members of a jury, the service man might be allowed to challenge the odd member of the court martial, bearing in mind that they are judges of both fact and law?

Dr. Godman: That would be a useful regulation. I regret that that does not appear in my new clause.

I said that this is my sincere view. I have discussed the idea with a number of former senior non-commissioned officers, principally from the Army, and they expressed sympathy and support for such an innovation. I do not have documentary evidence of that sympathy and support but that has been said to me not 20 yards from where I stand now.

I have no doubt that that view is regarded as an abomination by the hidebound or seemingly hidebound Ministry of Defence, as well as, perhaps, some Conservative Members who are present tonight. I have no doubt that we shall hear once again the classic conservative argument that the moment has not yet arrived; that the moment is not propitious for such radical change. Nevertheless, I shall pursue the argument.

Support for this conservative approach to the composition of the courts martial is often sought from the findings of the Lewis report, which was published in 1946. That committee, under the chairmanship of Mr. Justice Lewis, stated that it would not recommend that other ranks served on courts martial.

However, Mr. Raymond Blackburn, a Labour Member of Parliament, added by way of an addendum a note of dissent to the conclusions and recommendations of the Lewis report. My amendment is in broad sympathy with what he said. Incidentally, Mr. Blackburn served as a captain with that fine county regiment, the East Yorkshire regiment, my late father's regiment. My father was awarded the military medal when he served with, I think, the fourth battalion of that regiment. Mr. Blackburn was also, I believe, the author of a pamphlet entitled "The Soldier's Guide to His Rights and Duties".

Let me quote from Mr. Blackburn's note of dissent these long years ago. He said:

"While subscribing to the Report as a whole, I regret that on one subject I do not wholly agree with my colleagues on the Committee, namely on the composition of the Court in Courts-Martial. I believe:—

(a) That a private soldier, lance-corporal, or corporal (or lance-bombardier or bombardier) should have the right to demand that one corporal (or bombardier) should sit on a Court-Martial composed of three persons trying him, or that two corporals (or bombardiers) should sit on a Court-Martial composed of five persons trying him."

I make no apologies for quoting liberally from Mr. Blackburn's note of dissent. He went on to say:

"(b) That a serjeant or warrant officer should have right to demand that one serjeant or warrant officer, as the case may be, should sit on a Court-Martial composed of three persons trying him, or that two serjeants or warrant officers should sit on a Court-Martial composed of five persons trying him.

(c) That the remaining members of the Court should be officers and should be the only members of the Court determining sentence."

One can see the gist of his remarks. He is suggesting something which seems to me to be analogous to the civilian jury system. He then said:

"In civilian life a man charged with a serious offence has in effect the right to demand trial by his peers because a jury is taken at random from all the sections of the community to try him."

I have a great deal of sympathy with that. I also sympathise with what Mr. Blackburn said next:

"In the services, one cannot introduce a similar provision to ensure that a jury is drawn at random from all members of the services, because to do so would conflict with discipline."

I would not disagree with Mr. Blackburn there. He continued:

"The central problem in Courts-Martial is the reconciliation of discipline with justice. But I suggest that an attempt should be made to assimilate Court-Martial procedure to civilian procedure in this important respect, if it can be done without affecting discipline."

Mr. Bermingham: It seems something of an anachronism, for example, that on a Thursday a man is a sergeant-major and is not eligible to sit on a court martial yet he can be promoted the following Thursday to be a lieutenant and he is eligible. Does that make much difference, in my hon. Friend's opinion?

Dr. Godman: As I said in Committee, somebody who is promoted from the rank of regimental sergeant-major to lieutenant in my view would be precisely the same kind of man. It may well be that the Minister of Defence, other Ministers and some Conservative Members would argue that such a man would receive the appropriate training to enable him to perform a useful role when sitting on a court martial. With regard to the proportion of officers who have come up through the ranks, I seem to remember having been told by Ministry of Defence officials that in the Navy the figure was in the region of 20 per cent. and in the Royal Air Force it was about the same proportion, with a percentage not so very different for the Army.

Mr. Peter Viggers (Gosport): Those figures are correct, but they exclude officers who have been promoted before the age of 30 from the ranks. In other words, the numbers of serving officers who have served in the ranks are higher than the figures mentioned by the hon. Gentleman.

Dr. Godman: I am grateful for that intervention as the hon. Gentleman has considerable experience, I think I am right in saying, in the Royal Navy and in service matters in general. His graceful intervention supports what I was saying in reply to my hon. Friend the Member for St. Helens, South (Mr. Bermingham).

If I may press on with Mr. Blackburn, he went on to say:

"But corporals (or bombardiers) are men who have received promotion because they have a sense of responsibility and discipline. If they can be trusted with the lives of their sections in the exacting predicaments of battle, surely they can be trusted to serve as members of a jury. The proposal which I have made would limit their conscience to serving as jury men, as they would not be consulted on sentence."

There I part company with Mr. Blackburn, though in general I have a great deal of sympathy for his remarks. His note of dissent stands the test of time.

Paragraph 16 on page ix of the 1981 report of the Select Committee on the Armed Forces Bill says:

"Various evidence was taken by the Committee on the composition of courts-martial. We asked in particular whether the time had come for those below commissioned rank to be represented on courts-martial. Although it was denied by the Ministry of Defence that there was any identifiable wish for such a change within the Services and argued by them that American and Canadian experience showed a majority of Servicemen preferring to be tried by officers rather than by their peers, we did not feel that these defences of the status quo were wholly satisfactory. The absence of general discontent with the existing system does not necessarily mean the denial of the right of choice to those, even if only a minority, who would prefer to be tried under some closer approximation to the jury system. It is possible that a greater flexibility in administering Service justice might be found which would not undermine the virtues of the present arrangements. Since this issue has not been subjected to a full review since the Lewis Committee and the Pilcher Committee in the 1940s we believe that such a review is now due and ought to be conducted before the introduction of the 1986 Armed Forces Bill."

The Select Committee's report which was published yesterday contains a somewhat disingenuous statement. Paragraph 30 on page xiii of the report says:

"We note that the Ministry of Defence has in every case modified the rules of service discipline as recommended. In two cases where the 1981 Committee recommended a review of the present practice—with regard to the statutory definition of 'the enemy' and to composition of courts martial—the Government carried out such a review but concluded that changes are not practicable or desirable. The Committee accept the validity of the government's arguments in these two cases, and consider that in general the recommendations of the 1981 Committee relating to service discipline have been implemented in a satisfactory manner."

I do not accept that slick statement, and it helps to explain why I voted against the report. There is a good case for the change that is proposed in new clause 1.

Mr. Viggers: The hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman) made an interesting speech on Second Reading. One of his points related to the constitution of courts martial, and I thought that it would be a very interesting and worthwhile point to pursue. I have made a number of inquiries since then. They confirm the view that I held previously: that it would not be a good idea to change the existing constitution of courts martial.

I say that for two reasons. It is appropriate for officers to sit as members of courts martial. They have had specific training in various matters, including law, which enables them to contribute properly to courts martial. This point is made on page 200 of the committee's report. Paragraph 5 of the 1985-86 report of the Select Committee on the Armed Forces Bill the Ministry of Defence says:

"commissioned officers . . .are selected and specifically prepared through a planned programme of courses and training throughout their Service, to fulfil the responsibilities of commissioned rank. A part of that career planning is progressive training in military law and responsibility for the administration of discipline from the outset of their commissioned Service."

So there is a plus point in having officers serve as members of courts-martial: they have been properly trained.

9.15 pm

Not only is there a plus point—I hope and believe that my feelings about this are as genuine as those of the hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman), who gives serious thought to these matters—there is also a minus point if non-commissioned officers are to be included as members of courts-martial. On page 201, our report says:

"It was also felt that the Warrant Officer's position with functions in the disciplinary field concerned with prevention, investigation and reporting of offences should continue to remain separated from the judcial role, the responsibility of commissioned officers."

It goes on to say:

"Firm views were expressed by senior non-commissioned officers, the category from which representation would be obtained, that membership of courts-martial should continue to be confined to commissioned officers who were ultimately responsible for the maintenance of discipline."

It is right that the maintenance of discipline should be the responsibility of officers who, let us remember, are separated in a number of carefully graded ways from the non-commissioned officers and other men in the armed forces. That careful separation of officers from men exists not just for some old-fashioned, out-dated social reason but because officers have a specific responsibility for discipline and other matters. There is a real benefit in having officers as members of courts-martial and a disadvantage in not having them. Because of this, I oppose the amendment.

Mr. Bermingham: In 1946 Mr. Justice Lewis was looking at the world of 1946; in 1986 we are supposed to be looking at the world of 1986. I listened with care in Committee—it was one of the stages at which I was present, before the row developed between me and the Committee and I departed, not in high dudgeon but in despair because, once again, the arguments trotted out in Committee were arguments which were as old as time: we have officers and we have others. To a large extent, we have got rid of that kind of concept in the rest of our social structure. There was a time when it was the squire who was the magistrate and the labourer who was always the defendant. In 1986 it is the farm worker, whether he be a manager or a farm labourer, who very often sits by the squire on the magisterial bench. No Member of the House would deny that many of our courts are well manned by people who do ordinary jobs.

Of course, they are taught the law. We teach magistrates the law. Why can we not teach the senior non-commissioned officers in the armed services the appropriate amount of law? In any case, courts-martial have a judge advocate in attendance to advise. A court-martial is a court of fact. If we broaden the group of people who are to judge the facts, we may on occasion bring to its deliberations a degree of common sense. There is an old doctrine: it is called the doctrine of common sense. The ability to use it is found in the private as well as in the general.

In what is supposed to be an intelligent and increasingly better educated society, I cannot understand why we have to retain in our courts-martial system principles and prejudices more suited to the 17th and 18th centuries, when only members of the officer class were taught to read and write. All that we have sought to do in this Committee in 1986, and all that my hon. Friend has sought to do, is to bring to the court-martial a touch of the 20th century, a touch of trial by one's peers. One's peers are not just one's commanding officer but also one's compatriots, one's friends, fellow members of one's regiment or ship or squadron, people who understand the various aspects of day-to-day life. If we fail on this one in 1986, those of us who are still here in 1991 will have to come back to the same argument. I have done my arithmetic and that is when the legislation will come before us again.

We cannot stop the passage of time and the development of social awareness. The Government cannot retreat for ever, as the Ministry did so often when answering questions from myself and others in the Select Committee, behind the barricades of history by using the defence, "We have always done it this way." For the second time tonight I ask the Minister to accept that when my hon. Friends and I move amendments we are not trying to upset the constitution or to pull down the pillars of the establishment. All we are trying to do is to move the Ministry into the 20th century before we get to the 21st.

Mr. Wallace: The Select Committee did not give sufficient attention to this important matter. Clearly the world of 1946 was very different from the world of 1986, as the hon. Member for St. Helens, South (Mr. Bermingham) has said. The days of the rich man in his castle and the poor man at his gate have gone out of the window.

I have given careful thought to the new clause. Various factors do not persuade me to support it. Not least of them is the amount of training which is part of an officer's career scheme. It is doubtful whether a panel of senior NCOs with the necessary training would be available to participate in a court-martial when required. Many of us were not entirely satisfied about the amount of consultation on some points. Sometimes we felt that if something was not mentioned it was assumed that everyone was happy with it. Since the passage of the previous legislation there has been a review with this specifically in mind. From the evidence presented to the Committee about the Army, it seemed to have gone into the matter in considerable detail. There was confidence in the system, and confidence in a judicial system is important

The hon. Member for Gosport (Mr. Viggers) might have continued to read from the report and to give the view of some service men that there might be representation on a court martial by warrant officers. Although in some cases they might not be suitable because of their functions in regard to discipline, it was felt that they might have something to contribute because their understanding of a soldier's motivation or background experience might be different from that of a commissioned officer. There might be a good case for giving further consideration to whether those of the rank of warrant officer might be suitable to sit on a court martial. Because the new clause goes further than that, I cannot support it.

Mr. Stanley: Hon. Members have largely covered all the essential points of argument on both sides. I merely want to stress to the Committee that the Government took seriously the recommendation of the 1981 Select Committee. We were asked to consider the issue again. It is an issue about which my colleagues and I in the Department did not have any preconceived notions and which we approached with an open mind.

The study was carried out very carefully. The hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace) referred to the extensive work which was done by all three services and that is detailed in memorandum No. 18, which starts on page 200. Very careful consultation took place and in the light of that consultation and the advice that we received from the services we came to the conclusion that there was no basic case for departing from the initial conclusion that goes back to the Lewis report that the present system works thoroughly satisfactorily.

We are undoubtedly influenced by the fact that, having carried out an extensive consultation within the three services, in our view there is no doubt at all that there is no evidence of any material desire within the non-commissioned ranks of the armed forces for the composition of courts-martial to be altered.

I was most interested by the observations of my hon. Friend the Member for Gosport (Mr. Viggers). Clearly, he has made his own independent soundings in the constituency he represents, which has one of the highest concentrations of service men in the country, and the feedback to him was the same.

I believe that, as the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland quite rightly said, the crucial factor is whether the existing composition of courts-martial commands the confidence of service men of all ranks and at all levels. I think that without any question the answer to that is an emphatic yes. Given that we have a system at present which is working well and satisfactorily and that there is no material desire for a change, I believe that the Committee's conclusion that the present system should be kept was the right one, and I must ask the Committee to reject the new clause.

Mr. McNamara: I believe that in looking at this clause the Government, the hon. Member for Gosport (Mr. Viggers) and the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace) omitted to notice one important thing—that it contains an option. It is not mandatory. It would meet the point that was raised by some hon. Gentlemen that they would not want to have on their court-martial a regimental sergeant-major or senior warrant officers. It would also meet another very important point, that there should be felt to be within the court martial a degree of experience and understanding particularly of the position of the private soldier which the officer, for all his legal training and concern for his soldiers, sailors or airmen, might not have.

When the Lewis committee was looking at this back in 1946 the reason why it rejected the suggestion of having non-commissioned officers on the committee—and I am not now talking about Mr. Blackburn's amendment, a note of dissent which my hon. Friend mentioned—was that "today, when nearly all officers have to graduate from the ranks, the danger in question is a remote risk".

The danger in question was that officers would not have experience of the problems of the ordinary soldier and sailor.

But, if the majority of officers at that time did come through the ranks because of what was happening in the war, that is not the case on this occasion. When we sought information on this from the Ministry, we found that in the Royal Navy 22 per cent., in the Royal Marines 24 per cent., in the Army, male officers, 22 per cent. and in the RAF 21 per cent. — barely one fifth, certainly not a majority — of serving officers had come through the ranks. That is proved if one looks at the footnote to which the hon. Member for Gosport referred in the supplementary note from the Ministry of Defence.

I put it to the Committee that there is room for experimentation here. I accept that no great dissatisfaction has been expressed with the present system. But it seems to have been part of the Panglossian attitude of the Ministry of Defence throughout that if there have been no grumbles the situation is not capable of being improved. The Opposition do not believe that the court-martial system as it exists at present is necessarily the best possible system.

9.30 pm

If the defendant had the option of having someone there who had experienced his society and his type of life, it would help. It would not be impossible to ensure that the necessary training was given to non-commissioned officers. No wonderful sleight of hand can make a regimental sergeant-major into a commissioned subaltern with sufficient experience to sit immediately on a court-martial.

Thus the argument does not stand up and the dependence on Lewis does not stand up, because the facts have changed. There is room to make this alteration. Accordingly, we shall seek to divide the Committee.

New Clause 2

SOCIAL INQUIRY REPORTS

'For any case brought before a court martial or a standing civilian court, the court shall have power to call for a social inquiry report to be made where it is considered that to do so would assist the court.'.—[Dr. Godman.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Dr. Godman: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

If every other court in the land on occasion seeks the advantageous use of social inquiry reports, why not courts martial?

Mr. Stanley: The proposition of the hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman) is straightforward, but I shall speak at greater length than he did.

The 1981 Select Committee accepted that current procedures already provided a great deal of relevent information about the character, background and circumstances of an accused person. However, the Committee suggested that full information of this type was particularly important in the case of young offenders and recommended the evolution of a system under which social inquiry reports on young offenders could be made more readily available. As a result of our consideration of this recommendation, I announced during the debate on the Army, Air Force and Naval Discipline Acts (Continuation) Order 1985 that a system had been introduced which would allow social inquiry reports to be provided in cases where a young Army or RAF service man was appearing before a court martial charged with a serious offence. Social inquiry reports may also be provided in other cases if appropriate. They will also be provided in similar circumstances for young civilian offenders appearing before a standing civilian court or court martial. These reports will be prepared by qualified SSAFA social workers or, in Germany, by the senior probation officer. In the case of the Navy, social inquiry reports will continue to be provided by the naval personal and families service. This system of social inquiry reports has now been in place for nearly a year and appears to be working well.

In the new clause, the hon. Gentleman seeks to extend the provision of social inquiry reports to all courts martial and standing civilian courts. However, his draft clause is, I am afraid, seriously defective. It contains no definition of the term "social inquiry report" which is defined where it appears in other legislation. The draft clause does not lay a statutory duty on any particular body or person to produce social inquiry reports where these are called for and, without this, the amendment can have no legal effect.

More substantively we do not consider this amendment to be necessary. Even where a formal social inquiry report is not provided, full information on an offender's character, background and circumstances must already be given to the court as a matter of course under regulations governing the conduct of the various types of service courts. In the Army and RAF the information thus routinely provided has recently been improved and expanded in order to provide the fullest possible detail. No comparable improvement was necessary in the Navy since there are already facilities to provide full social inquiry reports on all offenders. This is possible because of the much smaller number of courts martial in the Navy. I can assure the House that the duty to provide this information is taken very seriously. However, if the court is not satisfied with the information it has been given, it can order such extra information as it requires and adjourn while that is prepared.

9.45 pm

Taken together with the provision of formal social inquiry reports on all young offenders wherever practicable and also on other, older, offenders where deemed appropriate and where resources permit, I believe that the personal information already provided to service courts is perfectly sufficient. On that basis I ask the Committee to reject the amendment because I believe that it is superfluous in terms of the practice we are already following.

Mr. McNamara: I have listened carefully to what the Minister said. We do not accept the point that he has made. We do not think that the clause is inappropriate. We think that more mandatory information should be given. If the clause of my hon. Friend the Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman) is defective we should be happy if the Minister would accept the principle of it and allow it to go through to be amended in another place. I hope that we shall divide on the clause.

Mr. Dalyell: On the matter of older offenders, was there a social inquiry report and did the procedure work in the case of the airman of 9 Royal Signals Regiment who was tried as a result of the so-called Cyprus spy trial? This is not the time nor place to go into that, but some of us begin to wonder whether far more inquries ought to have been made before charges were initiated.

New Clause 3

ABOLITION OF CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

'(1) In section 43 of the Naval Discipline Act 1967 the words "(a) death" shall be removed.

(2) In section 71 of the Army Act 1955 the words "(a) death" shall be removed.

(3) In section 71 of the Air Force Act 1955 the words "(a) death" shall be removed.

(4) All consequential references in the above Acts to the application of death sentences shall cease to have effect.'.—[Mr. Bermingham.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Bermingham: I beg to move. That the clause be read a Second time.

It seems almost anachronistic that in this day and age a serving soldier in the United Kingdom in peace time who is taking part in an exercise which may well lead to the restraint, of strikers, for example, could find himself on a charge which led to the imposition of the death penalty. In the United Kingdom today, if a soldier changes sides in a combat, we can hang him.

We have debated time and time again the whole question of capital punishment. During the Committee stage of the Bill—I refer to paragraphs 412 to 464 of the report — I make no apologies for the fact that throughout the bulk of that period the questions were asked by myself.

Question accordingly agreed to.

Bill, as amended (in the Select Committee), again considered.

Question again proposed, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Bermingham: As I was saying, before the commercial break that we have just had, the purpose behind the probing questions that lay between paragraphs 412 and 464 was to ascertain the real position. At the risk of repeating what is to be found in the report, after a series of questions to various Members of the Ministry of Defence from myself and various other hon. Members, we eventually reached a point where Mr. Facer was answering the questions.

It appears that there are five offences under the various Army Acts which can be summed up as giving aid and comfort to the enemy. We began by seeking to probe what was meant by "the enemy". But it appears that we have no definition of that. The enemy appears to be anybody who opposes a soldier. That means that he can be a civilian. It took us a little probing finally to establish that.

We reached the point where we found that if a soldier is opposed and gives aid to the enemy, it did not really matter whether we were in peace time or at war because it then turned out that "being at war" meant anything. We have not had an official war since 1945, but we have had many disagreements. In Northern Ireland at present we have an enemy. Apparently, we have had an enemy in various other parts of the world. We can even have an enemy in the United Kingdom. But we do not have to be at war.

We began to prove the next aspect of this little matter. We found out that if a soldier is opposed he therefore has an enemy and if he gives aid and comfort to that enemy he may be guilty of one of the five offences. If he is, the court can then sentence him to death.

We then reached the rather interesting point in the discussion as to how we could sum all that up. I asked Mr. Facer question 464:

> "But it is possible at this moment in time, even though we are in a peacetime situation, for a British serviceman to be sentenced to death for one of these five offences if the offence occurs either in the United Kingdom, Northern Ireland, Belize, Gibraltar—anywhere where there is a British serviceman currently stationed, and he is liable for one of these five offences, if the court sees fit, to be sentenced to death?"

Mr. Facer, for the Ministry of Defence, replied, "That is so".

It would appear that a court martial can sentence any British serving soldier to death anywhere in the world for one of those five offences.

10.15 pm

We were then told in Committee that that would not happen. We asked why and were told that it was not the policy to execute anybody. Soldiers could be sentenced to death, but it was not the policy to execute them. The question naturally then came from me and from others: if it is not the policy now, who makes the policy? We established that it was the Government of the day. Therefore, if the Government changed their mind the sentence of death could be imposed in peacetime on a British serving soldier.

We then asked why and whether that had been done since 1945 and were told no. We then asked how it was known that it was a deterrent — what evidence was there. The reply was that since 1945 we have been able to do it, but we have never done it and it is not our policy to do it, so it must be a deterrent. We suggested turning the question the other way round. If, since 1945, it had been the policy not to do it and it had not been done, was there any evidence that it was a deterrent? We were told no, and the person who said no we never saw in the Committee again, I think because he gave us the wrong answer and let the cat out of the bag.

The truth is that the Ministry has no evidence to support the contention that the Army, which is full of volunteers, should be subject to a different form of legislation, punishment and control from anybody else. There is no justification for the position and there is no evidence to support the position—there is nothing. But, because we have been executing soldiers since they first marched across the face of the world, we have to carry on having this, and the Army has to have its death penalty for these five matters. It must be able in peacetime to string up by the neck until he is dead a soldier who, when he is asked to oppose a civilian group of people, and actually agrees with them and goes and joins them, is committing an offence which is punishable by hanging. That is an appalling situation.

Parliament has said time after time since the 1960s in respect of terrorism and many other matters that it will not hang men or women, yet the Armed Forces Bill retains the right — without evidence to support that retention, without justification, without any reason that we could ascertain in the Committee—and wishes to continue to retain the right, to hang. I ask the Minister why.

When we reached the stage in Committee at which amendments were tabled—and I drafted the amendment on this Section—I did not attend the meeting for the reasons that I have already given earlier tonight. We were so muddled in that Committee that I had walked out and made my position perfectly clear over the vote on the hon. Member for Newry and Armagh (Mr. Mallon) who wanted to give evidence to the Committee that it would not hear. When this was moved, we were defeated on straight party lines and the hon. Member was muzzled. I walked out at that stage. I stood by my decision not to take any further part in the proceedings and I did not attend the amendment sessions. Each of the amendments to the report falls according to straight party lines.

I said earlier that Select Committees are meant to be about the exchange of ideas. I felt that it was pointless to continue to attend meetings of the Committee. Therefore, I am bringing the arguments that I would have used in the Select Committee on to the Floor of the House. I make no apologies for taking time over it. It is an issue of principle and of conscience. Why should a soldier who volunteers to risk his life in the service of his country face any different form of justice and punishment from that which is faced by evey other citizen of this land? It is not right. If this House believes that it is a barbaric and ancient punishment that is best consigned to the history books, why should it be retained on the statute book for service personnel, even though the Ministry of Defence says that it is not its policy to use it?

Every five years we have the opportunity to try to bring the armed forces into line with the rest of the nation. In about 25 minutes from now, I suspect that, along party lines, we shall lose this new clause. If we lose it, it will be a tragedy. We shall have to wait another five years before we are able once again to seek to remove it from the statute book, just one more trace of our ancient past which does not do us much credit—the execution of human beings.

I accept that many hon. Members will disagree with me on equally strong points of conscience. I understand and respect their point of view. However, I ask the Committee to accept that this clause is moved very much in line with the thinking of many hon. Members who believe that the death penalty serves nobody well and ought not to remain in the Acts which govern the armed forces.

Mr. Kenneth Hind (Lancashire, West): The hon. Member for St. Helens, South (Mr. Bermingham) did not attend the meetings of the Select Committee to put forward his arguments. He has chosen instead to state them in this Chamber. Therefore, I intend to set out the arguments that would have been put to him by Conservative Members who serve on the Select Committee had he been there to listen to them.

It is important to note that this is hardly a hangover from our barbaric past. Only very specific offences attract the death penalty. They are the result of consideration in this House in 1981 when the then Armed Forces Bill was brought before the House and passed.

Two entirely different situations arise which must be stressed. If civilian types of offence are committed not during the course of hostilities, the civilan law applies to them If a soldier who is not on military duty or engaged in hostilities murders a comrade, he is subject to the normal law of this country and the death penalty does not arise. That does not apply to some of the other armed forces of the world, particularly in the United States. The death penalty applies there in peacetime for offences of murder, felony and rape and particularly, in the case of the Navy, for the offence of endangering a ship.

The situation in this country at present is that only those offences connected with hostilities attract the death penalty. It is eminently sensible that they should and there are very strong policy reasons for their doing so. They are:

"Misconduct in action (ie with intent to assist the enemy) . . . assisting the enemy (ie with intent to assist the enemy, communicating with or giving intelligence to the enemy or failing to make known to the proper authorities any information received from the enemy) . . . obstructing operations (ie with intent to assist the enemy) . . . mutiny (ie taking part in a mutiny having as its object the refusal or avoidance or any duty etc against or in connection with operations against the enemy) . . . and failure to suppress mutiny (ie with intent to assist the enemy, failing to use utmost endeavours to suppress or prevent a mutiny" . . . .

All these relate to hostilities. When hostilities occur, each member of the armed forces is responsible for assisting in the preservation of the lives of his colleagues. Failure to carry out his duty, for example, by mutiny, will seriously affect his colleagues and, no doubt, bring about the death of large numbers of them in groupings such as battalions or divisions. So it is essential to maintain discipline in order to save life.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): rose——

Mr. Hind: No, not the hon. Member. He has just come in.

Mr. Corbyn: I have been sitting here all the time.

Mr. Hind: The hon. Member for St. Helens, South made a point about hostilities and when they arise. When the Falklands war took place, that was not technically hostilities. There was no official declaration of war. Suppose that the soldiers who landed from the Sir Galahad had gone to their death as a result of information passed to the enemy by a serving soldier. We would have been failing in our duty if that had not been dealt with on the basis of the death penalty. Even though there had been no formal declaration of hostilities, they clearly existed.

These offences cover soldiers, airmen and naval personnel under fire from an enemy which is attempting to destroy British forces. These sections are important in strengthening discipline for men under fire. They are special. These categories do not apply to the kind of offence normally dealt with by the civilian code. They are there to protect not only the interests of our country but also the lives of serving personnel.

I can do no better than quote the answer in Select Committee of Lieutenant-General Sir John Chapple who, in answer to the hon. Member for St. Helens, South, described the offences which attract the death penalty. He said:

"They do require a positive act of treachery, or armed mutiny in one case, which could have a significant effect on our military effort and ultimately, therefore, on our national security and survival. For that reason all these five offences, which carry with them either the words 'with intent to assist the enemy' or 'with the object of avoiding duty against or impending operations against the enemy' are considered by the Ministry of Defence to warrant remaining in being."

That is a view that I endorse.

It must be borne in mind that the death penalty for these offences is not mandatory. It is subject to the discretion, first of all, of the court-martial. It is subject to the review procedure, the approving officer, and then, in the case of the Army, of the Army Board. There are provisions for appeal to the courts-martial appeals committee. It would have been better if the hon. Member for St. Helens, South had tried to strengthen the provisions for safeguards by suggesting that the courts-martial appeals committee be given the right to consider a sentence, which at the moment it has not got, rather than introducing this new clause which would remove a matter of fundamental policy which is necessary during hostilities.

10.30 pm

The armed services have made clear their policy. The provisions have not operated during peacetime for these offences because that is the policy of the Ministry of Defence, but they have to be there. Because of situations like the Falklands, we cannot change the provisions and say that there must have been a declaration of war.

In those circumstances, I urge all my colleagues to reject the argument that has been put forward and to vote against the new clause.

Mr. Stanley: As my hon. Friend the Member for Lancashire, West (Mr. Hind) has rightly said, the first and fundamental point is that the death penalty can be applied only where the offence is committed with the deliberate intention of assisting the enemy or, where mutiny is concerned, there is a deliberate attempt to avoid or impede operations against the enemy. Where the deliberate intention of assisting the enemy or avoiding or impeding operations against the enemy is present, there are now only five offences, to which hon. Members have referred, in the service Discipline Acts which would carry the death penalty. Those are misconduct in action, assisting the enemy, obstructing operations, mutiny and failure to suppress mutiny.

The 1981 Select Committee considered those five offences in considerable detail. It accepted that the death penalty should be retained as an ultimate and, of course, discretionary—not mandatory—punishment where there was a deliberate intention to assist the enemy. The 1981 Select Committee asked us to reconsider the definition of the enemy used in the legislation. The Department did that in great detail but, as I explained on Second Reading of the Bill, we came to the conclusion that all the alternative definitions are less satisfactory than the present definition and would be likely to widen rather than reduce the ambit of the death penalty.

In the Department we also considered carefully whether the death penalty should be retained for each of the five offences, and we concluded that it should. The 1986 Select Committee has also examined the issue, taking both oral and written evidence. It has concluded that no change should be made—rightly, in my view.

It must be stressed that the only circumstances in which the death penalty could be applied to service men would be for offences tantamount to the civilian criminal offence of treason where, unlike under service law, the death penalty is still mandatory. Treasonable activity within the ranks of the armed services in war would undoubtedly be a crime of the utmost seriousness. If committed, it would almost certainly lead directly to the loss of the lives of other service men performing their operational duties bravely and trusting in the loyalty of those serving with them.

The armed services were unanimous and clear in their advice to Ministers that it was right to retain the death penalty for offences tantamount to treason, and the Government accepted that advice. If the Opposition wish to press the new clause to a Division, I must ask my right hon. and hon. Friends to vote against it.

Mr. McNamara: The Opposition regret very much the advice which the right hon. Gentleman has given to his colleagues, because we feel that this is a matter of principle, as my hon. Friend the Member for St. Helens, South (Mr. Bermingham) said. We feel that there are circumstances and cases, particularly now, in view of the nature of our armed forces at the present time—that they are purely volunteers, that they are unlikely to be people who will go into it against their own wishes—which place them in difficulties. If they crack, it will not be because they are going to commit treason. They will crack because their own individual psyches are being put under enormous stress.

The Minister said that these were offences akin to treason. I think that the Judge Advocate-General said before the Committee that these were offences akin to treachery. If that is so and this is a civilian crime, so be it. Then members of the armed forces, who are, after all, only civilians in uniform, will be subject to that legislation. But in terms of the profession they follow, which is an honourable one, to maintain the security of our nation, these are volunteers, and it is an insult to them that the Government think it necessary to have these provisions in the Army discipline code at the present time.

One thing that worries us in particular is again the Panglossian attitude of the Ministry of Defence to these matters. When we asked the Ministry why it was that in other NATO countries it was not felt necessary to have the death penalty, we got a special supplementary memorandum from the Department on it. Roughly half maintain it, but half do not, and significant among the half that do not are precisely those countries which, like us, have had a lot of conflict, particularly as they have divested themselves of, or in some cases have sought to retain, empire and therefore have been engaged in armed conflict since the war. Countries such as France and Portugal, in particular, which have had tremendous colonial wars, have abolished the death penalty. I cite those two because they are similar in nature and in status to our country.

It was in reply to the hon. Member for Ilford, South (Mr. Thorne) that the game was given away. He asked whether the maintenance of the death penalty prevented subversion, whether it really operated as a deterrent—question 409:

> "Surely, if one is recruiting people as volunteers it does not stop one from recruiting people from subversive powers, and if such people are recruited surely there is no proof they are discouraged from being recruited because there is a death penalty?
> (Mr. Facer.) It is extremely difficult to prove these things, and evidence of deterrence even in other areas tends to be inconclusive."

That is pretty good from an Under-Secretary at the Ministry of Defence when they are spending all this money on Trident; but be that as it may, he went on:

> "I think it would be fair to say we take the view that the existence of the death penalty for these particular offences provides an extra dimension to deterrence which may prevent an act of this kind, which we all hope would never occur anyway; it may make it even less likely than it is. I think that is about all I can say on the subject of deterrence."

That, roughly, is all the Committee heard from the Department. They had no evidence. They had not looked at other countries and asked why they had taken it away or why had they retained it. They just sat there, smug and content. It had been around a long time and they thought they ought to retain it.

When I was listening to the hon. Member for Lancashire, West (Mr. Hind), who spoke in support of retaining the death penalty, I did not feel that we were getting any argument which showed the effectiveness of retaining the death penalty as a deterrent. I thought that he was speaking only in terms of retribution. Retribution may be an argument for maintaining the death penalty, but it is not one that I would accept and it was never advanced by the Ministry of Defence when it was putting forward its case. Its argument was purely and simply on the basis of deterrence.

Mr. Hind: Perhaps the hon. Member would consider that, far from the death penalty being retribution, its deterrence factor in this situation is related to the need to stand by one's colleagues. If there is an option for a person to run away and save his own life in the face of knowing he will lose the lives of many of his colleagues, in such cases it is important to have the death penalty as the deterrent. That is the key to the matter. Retribution is not the essential element: the essence is deterrence.

Mr. McNamara: We no longer have a conscript Army; we have an Army and services of honourable. people who are not likely to crack in that way. If they do crack, it will not be because of cowardice but because of something wrong in their psyche.

It is possible under the existing legislation for a soldier to commit an offence and for it to carry the death penalty. It cannot be a good thing that other people, who are not members of the armed services, can commit the same offence and not be subject to the death penalty.

New Clause 4

QUALIFICATION TO OFFENCE OF INDECENT BEHAVIOUR

'(1) In section 66 of the Army Act 1955 at the end there shall be added the words—"provided that for an action to constitute an offence of disgraceful conduct of an indecent or unnatural kind it must be one which is prejudicial to good conduct and discipline.".

(2) In section 66 of the Air Force Act 1955 at the end there shall be added the words "provided that, for an action to constitute an offence of disgraceful conduct of an indecent or unnatural kind, it must also be one which is prejudicial to good conduct and discipline".

(3) In section 37 of the Naval Discipline Act 1957, at the end there shall be added the words—"provided that, for an action to constitute an offence of disgraceful conduct of an indecent or unnatural kind, it must also be one which is prejudicial to good conduct and discipline".',—[Mr. McNamara.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. McNamara: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

In our dealings with the armed forces we have always suggested that they are civilians in uniform. The separate army code of discipline is regrettably necessary because of the nature of the calling. Generally, we have sought to say that a soldier is no more than a civilian in uniform. Therefore, he should have the same rights, the same way of life, and the same right to organise his life as any other citizen. That is not the case with homosexual conduct.

I was the only person on the Committee who had been present and taken part in the debates in 1967 on the Bill of my hon. Friend the Member for Tornaen (Mr. Abse), then the hon. Member for Pontypool, which sought, and eventually achieved its aim, of no longer making homosexual conduct in private between consenting males of adult age a criminal offence. That is the way we feel it should be in the armed services. That does not mean that we condone the act or that we necessarily approve of it. It merely means that we should no longer regard it as a criminal offence in the armed forces. It is sufficient, in the terms of the amendment we have tabled, that it should be treated as heterosexual conduct would be. If it is "prejudicial to good order and discipline." it should be an offence, but for no other reason.

The Ministry of Defence's evidence on this matter is a mess of contradictions and prejudice. There is no scientific or sociological research to back up the ways it has looked at the matter. It did not even know some of the witnesses, even the senior witness. It did not know that AIDS is a communicable disease or that there were differences in the evidence given by witnesses. The Ministry's idea was based on a social perception for which no evidence could be produced. The Ministry claimed that it was a perception held in society but it was certainly not one held in Britain in the past 30 years.

The Ministry advanced a series of arguments in favour of regarding the homosexual act as an offence in military terms. That evidence was challenged by the Campaign for Homosexual Equality and by evidence from the Conservative Group for Homosexual Equality, which numbers among its patrons the hon. Member for Derbyshire, West (Mr. Parris), the hon. Member for Hornchurch (Mr. Squire) and Mr. Martin Stevens, the late hon. Member for Fulham.

The main argument advanced is that the law on homosexuality endangers national security because it renders soldiers embarking upon that course of conduct liable to blackmail. They are liable to blackmail only because it is a criminal offence. If it was not a criminal offence we would not have had the Cyprus inquiry. We would have avoided the great loss of money and the show trial at the Old Bailey under section 1 of the Offical Secrets Act. We could have saved the country a great deal of money and prevented a lot of egg from going on the face of the Ministry.

There is no reason why homosexuality should be a danger to national security other than the fact that it is an offence under the Armed Forces Act. If it is prejudicial to good conduct and discipline, it should be treated in that way. Every example cited by the Ministry's witnesses was an example that could have been dealt with under conduct prejudicial to discipline.

The Conservative group argues that the present law can adversely affect recruitment and the retention of good personnel. It argues that the application of the law has been marred by abuse and unnecessary suffering and is haphazard in its application. It is relevant to note that our NATO allies do not feel it is necessary to have such legislation.

For those reasons, we argue that homosexual conduct —not something of which I approve—should not be a criminal offence under Army law. It must be treated in the same way as heterosexual behaviour. When such behaviour is prejudicial to good conduct and discipline it should be dealt with. Otherwise, it should be ignored.

The Royal Air Force in its evidence came close to admitting that if homosexual conduct occurred off the station between two consenting males it was not especially bothered. It was bothered only when it was prejudicial to discipline. I do not think that the Government have made any case except one derived from a tangle of prejudices, outmoded thought and a desire to inflict upon the armed services a morality that the rest of society no longer accepts. I do not believe that we should treat our soldiers, sailors and airmen in that way.

Mr. Stanley: I shall start by repudiating the comments of the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North (Mr. McNamara) regarding the Government's approach. He appears to believe that it is based on prejudice and mistaken, anachronistic, social views, but that is not so. We have considered the issue seriously in the context of this quinquennial review, and it is our clear view that we must maintain the best possible discipline and operational efficiency in the armed services. It is against that yardstick, and not against any outmoded prejudice or anachronistic social view, that we have approached the problem.

Mr. Chris Smith (Islington, South and Finsbury): Will the Minister then tell the House what it is in a gay relationship between two males which would endanger the good discipline in the services?

Mr. Stanley: If the hon. Gentleman will allow me to reply to the opening speech, I shall be glad to try to do so.

The aim of the new clause is to make homosexual practices on the part of members of the armed forces an offence against service discipline only where it can be construed as being prejudicial to good conduct and discipline.

The Committee will be aware that all homosexual practices involving service personnel continue to be offences under the Service Discipline Acts, regardless of the sex, age or willing consent of those involved. That position is specifically preserved by section 1(5) of the Sexual Offences Act 1967 which otherwise permitted sexual acts between consenting adult males in private. The Committee will want to register that that legislation is just under 20 years old, and was the subject of a specific reservation at that time.

The exemption of the armed forces was in recognition of the unique circumstances of service life. Membership of the armed forces involves service men and service women serving in conditions where, both on and off duty, they are unavoidably living in close proximity and sometimes under stress. In addition, service life, particularly in demanding operational circumstances, requires absolute trust and confidence between all service men based on disciplined and professional relationships. Both the services and the Government are clear that the more permissive approach to homosexuality proposed in the amendment would not be in the interests of the good discipline or the professional efficiency of the services as a whole.

The issue was fully considered by the Select Committee which received evidence, not merely from the Ministry of Defence, but from bodies in favour of allowing a more permissive approach to homosexuality in the armed forces. The Select Committee took great care to consider both sides of the issue, and concluded in paragraph 25 of its report that it would not be wise to change the existing law. That is also the Government's view. That is a clear view put to us, not only by the top ranks in the services, but down through every level. There is complete endorsement of the existing legislation expressed in all three services from top to bottom.

We are clear that if we try to change the law as proposed, it would be prejudicial to the proper professionalism and fighting and managerial efficiency of the armed services. Therefore, if the Opposition wish to press the matter, I ask the Committee to reject the new clause.

Mr. McNamara: Usually I would not seek to reply, but the Committee should be aware of some of the statements made by the Minister which I do not accept. During an evidence session the Chairman asked:

"On that point, do you have any indication of the level of promiscuity in homosexual relationships? Do you have any figures available?

(Mr. Facer) No.

Mr. McNamara: That is something based on evidence; it is your general perception and feeling — common gossip — without any scientific support?

(Mr. Facer) It is based on general perceptions of society, not a judgment we take inside the Ministry of Defence."

That was the line on which the argument was based. In answer to the question

"Why should they be treated as military offences?"

Brigadier Peck replied:

"Because the military view is that homosexuality goes against the requirements of the Services."

I asked

"Why? Do not shrug your hands; I want to know why."

Then the admiral came on the scene to rescue the Army.

There is no evidence for the Minister's statements. Many of our NATO allies, who have a fighting reputation as great as ours, do not treat homosexuality as a criminal offence. The Government have not examined the evidence. There has been no sociological report. The Government's whole attitude is based on outworn prejudices such as we have come to expect from them. We shall divide the House on the issue.

New Clause 5

DISCRIMINATION

'For the purposes of the Armed Forces Act 1955, the Air Force Act 1955 and the Naval Discipline Act 1957, it shall be an offence for any person subject to those Acts to discriminate against, harass, hold in contempt or ridicule any person or persons on the grounds of religion, race, colour or political belief.'.—[Mr. McNamara.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

11.15 pm

Mr. NcNamara: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

This is an unusual clause because it is based upon no conclusions or even argument within the Committee. Yet the Committee had before it a 31-paragraph statement from the hon. Member for Newry and Armagh (Mr. Mallon), with eight appendices, which the Ministry of defence sought to rebut in a supplementary memorandum of 16 paragraphs. The Select Committee, in its wisdom, reached a majority decision to print both sets of evidence cheek by jowl, and then never came to any conclusion about them.

Yet if the evidence of the hon. Member for Newry and Armagh is correct, the Ministry of Defence's statement is nonsense. If the Ministry of Defence's statement is correct, the evidence of the hon. Member for Newry and Armagh is nonsense. With the wisdom that only this Select Committee could have, it decided not to reach any conclusion, not to examine the Ministry of Defence and not to examine the hon. Member for Newry and Armagh. That is regrettable.

The hon. Member for Newry and Armagh wrote to the Select Committee and asked to give evidence. He was told that the Select Committee would consider that when he submitted his evidence. He did so and was told to hold himself ready to come forward to give oral evidence, but he was not called. One would normally say, "Hard lines," but in this case there were pressing reasons why the hon. Member for Newry and Armagh should have been permitted by the Select Committee to come forward, and I should have thought that those reasons would have commended themselves to democrats.

The hon. Member for Newry and Armagh, in a difficult by-election, fought against two principal opponents. One, from Provisional Sinn Fein, was fought on an abstentionist platform. The other, from the Official Unionist party, was fought on a partial abstentionist platform; in other words, he would come in, sign up, get his money and go away. The Official Unionist candidate was defeated.

The hon. Member for Newry and Armagh desires as his ultimate objective to see the six counties of Northern Ireland part of a united Ireland. He seeks to achieve that not by the bullet or the bomb, but by arguing his case and by working constructively for it. He fought against opponents who had shown by their conduct how much they disparaged Parliament — Provisional Sinn Fein and the Official Unionists.

It was essential for this House to show its belief in the democratic method — its desire to give official democratic opportunities to people who advanced their point of view — and to show that Parliament had a forum, a great and unique Assembly, in which to discuss just those matters. I refer to the Select Committee that was discussing this Bill.

We are told that Ministers from the Northern Ireland Office told the majority on that Committee, "Do not call Seamus Mallon." [Interruption.] That statement has been made and has not be rebutted.

Mr. Stanley: I am happy to rebut it.

Mr. McNamara: On behalf of the Northern Ireland Office?

Mr. Stanley: I am happy to rebut it as a member of the Select Committee.

Mr. Viggers: I rebut it as another member of the Select Committee.

Mr. McNamara: The Minister and his hon. Friend should talk to some of their hon. Friends to discover why one of them told one of my hon. Friends that what I have described occurred. My hon. Friend in question was also a member of the Select Committee, and I value his opinion.

The evidence on both sides was contradictory. The Government said — and to show that I am not discriminating, I agree that the clause would apply to all regiments and all services—that they "reject any suggestion that either the discipline or training of the UDR is unsatisfactory."

Yet it was only at the turn of the year that the Government felt it necessary to make fresh arrangements for training the UDR. They then said:

"Training must lay special emphasis on the skills required by soldiers who act in support of the civil power and who, therefore, come into daily contact with members of the public."

That is why we say:

"it shall be an offence for any person subject to these Acts to discriminate against, harass, hold in contempt or ridicule any person or persons on the grounds of religion, race, colour or political belief."

The members of this regiment have power to search and question members of the public. The Government say that there is a good complaints procedure and they sent the Opposition a copy of it. The amendment then says:

"It is suggested that the procedure discourages members of the minority community from making complaints, but there is no reason why this should be the case."

I quote from a letter that was sent to the Select Committee from the parish priest of Bessbrook, Newry, County Down. He said:

"In my recent parish of Carrickmore, County Tyrone, I had reason to make representations on behalf of two of my parishioners at their request when they claimed they were ill treated by men from the UDR. I am enclosing copies of those statements and their accompanying letters and I would appreciate it if your committee would consider the allegations with a view to concrete steps. I believe that many who allege ill treatment at the hands of the UDR never make a formal complaint because I think they feel that it would be futile. Today I have spoken with the people connected with my enclosed complaints and there appears to be no follow up to the complaints. It all seems to have petered out or to have been shelved. They are interested in pursuing their complaints. Others, I feel, are afraid to complain."

The Committee had no opportunity to find out whether those complaints had been pursued because it was not allowed to take the evidence.

In its statement the Ministry of Defence says:

"If a member of the public is reluctant for any reason to make a complaint of this sort directly to a UDR unit, it may be addressed either to a higher army headquarters or through local civil representatives."

However, I received a letter at the beginning of this month which says:

"On Tuesday the 25th March I gave a detailed account to the civil representative who takes complaints regarding the British army and I gave him a copy of the enclosed. Every day of Holy Week the UDR, the British army and on one occasion the RUC did not cease to stand guard over St. Mallachy's church, question and search people coming in and out of the different Holy Week ceremonies and search cars around the church."

The conclusion of this particular parish priest was this:

"This would seem to have been a deliberate action on the part of the local military authorities following my statement."

There is dissatisfaction among the minority community in Northern Ireland about present procedures. It does not trust them. It does not believe that they are followed through. This is bad for the Ministry of Defence, the armed forces and the UDR.

Mr. Michael McNair-Wilson (Newbury): Is not the hon. Gentleman making a very discriminatory speech? Is he not aware that at least 10 per cent. of the UDR is drawn from the minority community in Northern Ireland? Is he not further aware that the UDR was set up with the specific purpose of recruiting as many people as possible from the minority community who wanted to play a part in upholding law and order in their Province in order to keep the community as a whole at peace and enable it to enjoy the same pleasures as we enjoy on this side of the Irish sea?

Mr. McNamara: According to the figures that were given to the Committee by the Ministry of Defence, those quoted by the hon. Gentleman are inaccurate. I remember the circumstances, because I took part in the debates. The UDR was introduced, following Lord Hunt's report, to replace the role of the former B Specials. It was hoped that the UDR would be seen as part of the British Army, as under the discipline of the British Army and as controlled by the British Army, and that it would therefore be regarded as an impartial enforcer of the law in that part of the United Kingdom which is called the six counties of Northern Ireland. Unfortunately——

Mr. Hind rose——

Mr. McNamara: I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman in a moment. Perhaps he will allow me first to answer this point.

Unfortunately, that did not prove to be the case. I shall now give way to the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Hind: Does the hon. Member not agree that during the course of their evidence to the Committee the witnesses from the Ministry of Defence said that there had been an active campaign by the IRA in Northern Ireland against Catholic members of the UDR when it had first been set up, and that there had been a large number of killings of Catholic members, which had effectively reduced, through fear, the proportion of Catholic members of the UDR to the present 2 per cent. or so?

11.30 pm

Mr. McNamara: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for making what were going to be parts of my speech. I am not seeking to disguise or glorify the role of the IRA, nor to gloss over the terrible way in which it has treated members of the UDR. Nor am I trying to minimise the casualties suffered by the UDR. That is not my role in this particular debate. My role is to try to find a way in which the minority community can feel some sense of support for the UDR.

There have been complaints about the conduct of the UDR and many individual members of it. I have not cited the examples given in this letter that I have here, because I did not want to inflame the situation, but these are complaints which have been made and which, in the first two cases, at any rate, have not been followed up. It is true to say that the UDR is seen by the minority community not to be an impartial enforcer of law and order, acting in support of the RUC and engaged in the pursuit of terrorists but, in many cases, to be harassing people, bringing weight to bear on them, making life difficult for people because they happen to have different political or religious views from the majority of the members of the UDR.

That may be regrettable. It may be that, because of pressure brought by the IRA, there are not as many Catholics in the regiment as the Government might wish. But it does not alter the fact of the present situation, that the UDR is seen by the majority of the people who voted for the hon. Member for Newry and Armagh as a force of oppression which has nothing particularly to do with suppressing terrorism but has more to do with keeping in its place a section of the community which does not accept the present status of the six counties of Northern Ireland within the United Kingdom. It is seen as an oppressive force.

People are dissatisfied because they have no confidence in the present system of presenting and dealing with grievances. People do not believe that the complaints are followed through: unless there is a concrete criminal charge, the RUC do not take the complaints very seriously. People feel little confidence in the discipline enforced in the UDR, because of the things that happen in their day-to-day lives.

That is why I am concerned about this. That is why I bring forward this new clause. It should be possible to create a new category of offence to cover the actions of members of Her Majesty's forces who criticise or harass anyone or who act in a way which challenges legitimate political and religious beliefs. A person's religion, race or politics is no business of any United Kingdom regiment. That members of the UDR use their status as members of the regiment to abuse people and to belittle them, or use the authority of the Queen's uniform or, as an hon. Member put it on another occasion, the Queen's cap badge, to oppress people is not something that any Member of the House would wish to see, let alone support.

Here, therefore, is an opportunity to show what we think of such actions by accepting new clause 5 and having it put into operation coherently, not only in Northern Ireland but throughout the United Kingdom and wherever British armed forces are stationed, to ensure that members of those armed forces show a proper respect for individuals.

Sir Antony Buck (Colchester, North): All hon. Members will agree with the sentiments expressed by the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North (Mr. McNamara). However, many of us wonder whether his new clause will assist the objectives which he outlined. I do not wish to be the pedantic lawyer, but how can the hon. Gentleman sustain the idea that there should be an offence of holding someone in contempt? How could the hon. Gentleman know whether I hold him in contempt? I do not, since he and I have been on many service visits together, and I hope that any court of law and the House would accept what I say. But how can one suggest that that would be appropriate to put before a judicial tribunal? That is the flaw in the hon. Gentleman's suggestion. The introduction of such a concept could be counter-productive because it would cause uncertainty. It is so vague as not to be a justifiable issue.

I entirely agree with most of the hon. Gentleman's sentiments about the need for a lack of discrimination, but the House must recognise its limitations. We cannot legislate to make people good, happy or indiscriminate, and although the new clause is well-meaning, it would be counter-productive. Although the intention of the new clause is correct, it would go against the admirable sentiments expressed by the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Hind: I support the view of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Colchester, North (Sir A. Buck). The clause is a statement of intent with which most members of the Committee would agree. Its major problem is that it is so broad that enforcement would be difficult. As a lawyer, I know that where the law is incapable of enforcement, it is brought into disrepute. One consequence is the crumbling of any code of discipline, whether for the armed forces or for civilian life. For that reason, I ask my colleagues to think carefully before introducing the new clause into the Bill.

The issue is the Ulster Defence Regiment. As a member of the Select Committee on the Armed Forces Bill, I should say that the question whether the hon. Member for Newry and Armagh (Mr. Mallon) should give evidence to the Committee was one of the most difficult that we faced. The Committee was constantly aware that it was supporting a democrat in difficult circumstances. I hope that hon. Members understand that we are aware of the difficulties under which Seamus Mallon came to the House.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Hind: I apologise; I should have said the hon. Member for Newry and Armagh (Mr. Mallon). We wanted to support a democrat who supported the process of constitutional change as opposed to violence. But our remit from the House, which was to consider the Armed Forces Bill, meant that it was outside our consideration. We would have been faced with examining the behaviour of every regiment, every section and every unit in the British Army if we had embarked on that course of action. It was an appropriate matter to be considered elsewheere, but not by the Select Committee.

Mr. Wallace: Does not the hon. Gentleman agree that the Committee was advised that certain matters dealt with in the memorandum of the hon. Member for Newry and Armagh (Mr. Mallon) would fall properly within its terms of reference? Many features of the Ulster Defence Regiment make it unique in the United Kingdom. Therefore, the argument of the hon. Gentleman that the Select Committee would have had to consider every other regiment is fallacious. Can the hon. Gentleman give the rebuttal which two of his hon. Friends have already given that he was not briefed by the Northern Ireland Office on whether the hon. Member for Newry and Armagh should give evidence? Certainly I was not, but I wondered whether the briefing was available only to Government supporters.

Mr. Hind: I had no specific briefing from the Northern Ireland Office. I was made aware by a third party of the view of the Northern Ireland Office. That was anecdotal, but I never received a briefing. In such circumstances I take cognisance of what I am told and the sense of the advice that I receive.

The point has been made that the Select Committee had to consider the discipline code of the British armed forces. The memorandum of the hon. Member for Newry and Armagh was connected much more with the role of that unit as a part of the British Army than with the actual discipline of that regiment. We were being asked to consider not whether the UDR should behave in a particular way but, more fundamentally, whether the UDR should be in existence in Northern Ireland and whether it should be carrying out its present role. That was entirely different from what has been raised here.

I emphasise that the Select Committee made a difficult decision because it realised that that was the course it should take within its remit. There are ways in which the matter could be considered but it is not by the vehicle of new clause 5.

Mr. Stanley: When the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North (Mr. McNamara) tabled the new clause I anticipated that he would wish to devote much of what he wanted to say to the Ulster Defence Regiment. As he has tabled the clause in a much wider context on the general question of discrimination I want to take the opportunity of the debate to make it clear that discrimination on grounds of race, religion, colour or any other grounds by members of any regiment or service of the armed forces in their dealings with other service men or with the public would not be tolerated and would be viewed extremely seriously. It is my view from what I have seen of the services—and I have been privileged to see a lot of them over the past three years—that they would find it absolutely abhorrent to be a party to discrimination in any of the forms to which I have referred.

Service law already contains a number of offences under which racial or religious discrimination would be an offence. For example, any conduct to the prejudice of good order and discipline is an offence and any act of racial or religious discrimination would fall within the ambit of that offence.

More specifically, anyone subject to service law who uses threatening, abusive, insulting or provocative words or behaviour likely to cause a disturbance commits an offence.

I should also point out that the code of practice for the treatment and questioning of persons by the service police under the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984, which came into effect on 1 March this year, contains this paragraph:

> "Discriminatory behaviour on the grounds of a person's ethnic or natonal origin may render a Service policeman, like any other member of the Armed Forces, liable to disciplinary action."

Finally, I should make it clear that the Race Relations Act applies to service in the Armed Forces.

Given all the safeguards against discrimination that I have outlined and which already exist in both service and civilian law, I do not consider that the new clause proposed would add usefully to the prevention of discrimination in the Armed Forces.

Turning to the specific issue which the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North has raised, one has of course become familiar with his perception of the UDR. I believe that he is profoundly and, I find, sadly mistaken in his perception of the UDR. I am in no doubt whatever that the UDR is an admirable group of men and women. Of course, one can always find exceptions and one knows that there have been some individual cases in which people have behaved in a way which has led to serious criminal prosecutions. I do not deny that for a moment and I am saddened by and deplore that as much as the hon. Gentleman does. But it is quite wrong to generalise in relation to the whole regiment on the basis of those very limited, exceptional and deplorable cases.

The UDR as a whole does its job in a totally non-sectarian way, as indeed does the RUC. They are there to support the civil power, to maintain law and order and to do their utmost against the awful pressure of terrorism or attempts at terrorism with which they live night and day.

I would hope that hon. Members on all sides of the Committee would recognise the enormous risks that people run simply by becoming members of the UDR. Those risks are well reflected in the casualty figures. More than 150 members of the UDR, including some women, have been killed as a result of terrorist violence over the years since the recent troubles began. More than 300 members of the UDR have suffered serious injuries. They have suffered thus trying to make a vital contribution to maintaining law and order in the Province and dealing with the very serious terrorist threat which they face.

I hope that we shall end the debate on this new clause with a real degree of unanimity in the Committee that the members of the UDR, both men and women, really deserve the highest admiration of the House.

Mr. Neil Thorne (Ilford, South): Would my right hon. Friend accept from me, for the sake of the record, as another member of the Select Committee on the Armed Forces Bill, that I was not approached by any Minister of the Northern Ireland Office on this or any other matter?

Mr. McNamara: I am sorry that the Minister took the attitude that he did to what I had to say, because I sought to choose my words very carefully indeed. I am very conscious that, for example, this week another member of the UDR was killed by terrorists. I am aware that many of these men and women think that they are playing a proper role for themselves and for the Province in which they live. I happen to think that this is wrong, but I believe that they are, by and large, honourable people. However, to the minority population they are seen as much as a cause of the problem as the problem itself. That is the point at issue. I believe that many of Her Majesty's subjects living in Northern Ireland have that perception of the UDR, regrettable as that may be.

Sir Antony Buck rose——

Mr. McNamara: I will not give way to the hon. and learned Gentleman. Time is precious, and I merely want to answer the points made.

In putting forward this new clause, we were conscious of trying to find some way in which we could make the UDR, like all other British regiments, subject to the same regulations. Nevertheless, we wanted to throw out a signal that, in the light of the Anglo-Irish Accord, there would be some hope of this result. The Minister, all other hon. Members and I know what a stumbling block at times the very existence of this regiment was in seeking to find some kind of agreement. The Committee knows that special regulations were issued after the accord was signed to try to allay some of the fear and suspicion in the minority community.

Despite what the Minister has said, this is an opportunity for us to show, by this clause, the attitude of this Committee to any conduct of the sort described by the Minister, conduct we all abhor. To those pedants amongst the lawyers in the Conservative Party, if members of the other place are not happy about the wording of the clause they can change it. To me, the wording is no worse than that in the Army regulations which the Minister praised and said rendered the clause unnecessary: he said that wording was merely repetitious and repeating what was already there. Let us make it clear, precise and accurate that in no regiment of the British Army can this sort of conduct be tolerated. This clause would signal that intention to the people of Northern Ireland.

Dr. Godman: The hon. Member for Lancashire, West (Mr. Hind) said in his speech that he had spoken to a third party. He did not say that that party was a Minister in the Northern Ireland Office.

Mr. McNamara: I know that. I was therefore going to conclude by saying that it was interesting to hear what the hon. Member for Lancashire, West said; his words were chosen with great care. The Committee took on board what he said. He did not contradict his right hon. and hon. Friends, but he pointed out that it had been suggested to him—and perhaps this was through the usual channel, who knows—that it might not have been helpful to call the hon. Member for Newry and Armagh (Mr. Mallon). That is a nice way of saying that this was said to him, that he was subject to some pressure or that he at least listened to the argument. He listened and voted as he did.

Question put, That the clause be read a Second time:—

Bill reported, without amendment.

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the Bill be now read the Third time. — [Mr. Stanley.] [Queen's Consent signified.]

12 midnight

Mr. McNamara: I should like to take a little longer on Third Reading than the Minister. You will have seen, Mr. Deputy Speaker, the reasoned amendment on the Order Paper tabled by the Opposition. It was not called and I do not quarrel with that in any way. However, it embodies a feeling of the utmost resentment on the part of Opposition Members of the Committee at the way in which we feel we have been treated. We did not expect, as the minority, to carry the day or to have equal determination but we did feel that opportunities should be given for evidence to be heard and cases examined.

The Chairman of the Select Committee ruled some matters out of order, although we felt that they were within the purview of the Bill. Those matters had been allowed on Second Reading. The Chairman's action implied criticism of Mr. Speaker. We were not allowed to discuss section 10 of the Crown Proceedings Act 1947, which was a matter of considerable concern to Members on both sides of the Committee.

As the Committee proceeded we found that our line of questioning was being interrupted and decisions were being taken. My hon. Friends the Members for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman), for St. Helens, South (Mr. Bermingham), the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace) and myself felt that we were unable to continue our line of questioning. We were stopped, not on the grounds that we were going outside the realms of the Bill, but on the strange grounds that somehow or other the Ministry of Defence should not have to explain its attitudes on matters which were before the Committee.

We reached the surprising situation in which the guillotine motion was moved by the parliamentary private secretary to the Minister of State for the Armed Forces, the hon. Member for Kettering (Mr. Freeman) to prevent the Committee from sitting when the Calcutt inquiry report was produced. We now know that Mr. Calcutt delivered his report to the Secretary of State for Defence yesterday, the same day that the report of the Select Committee came out. The Government had so much respect for the integrity of the House and for its abilities that they gave the house less than 24 hours in which to read perhaps the most substantial report ever to come from the Select Committee.

We had 24 hours in which to table amendments. This is not the way that Governments should treat Oppositions. This is not the way to maintain goodwill. They are trampling over the rights of the Opposition. We are not asking to have our own way but to have the opportunity to hear evidence. The Minister has said that we had an opportunity to hear evidence on homosexuality.

We heard much evidence from the Ministry and its officials. We had written evidence, but we were denied the right to call the Campaign for Homosexual Equality and denied the right to hear evidence from the Conservative group on homosexual reform. We were denied the evidence from these two groups and from the hon. Member for Newry and Armagh (Mr. Mallon) and Mr. Calcutt.

In the past I have had the privilege of being a member of a Select Committee under several distinguished Conservative Chairmen.

I have had the privilege of being a Chairman of a Select Committee. In all my experience I have never known of Members not being allowed to hear evidence. I have never known the Chairman of the majority party on the Committee state that the Committee will not call a person who wants to give evidence.

To move a guillotine in such a way was despicable. It was a most unhappy Committee upon which to serve. I regret it very much. In five years' time, when we are in Government, I hope that we will have more grace and more favour and more support. The election result at Fulham tonight will make sure of that.

Mr. Viggers: In view of the comments that have been made about the Committee of which I was the chairman, I think it is right that the record should be put straight.

The Second Reading of the Bill was on 21 November 1985 and the Select Committee had its first sitting on 19 December 1985. There were full sittings from 15 January to 24 March — a period of two months and 10 days. Early during the Committee's proceedings the members discussed broadly the timing of the investigation, and agreed to seek to complete deliberations by Easter, subject to the Calcutt report which remained to be discussed later.

On 19 February at the seventh sitting my hon. Friend the Member for Kettering (Mr. Freeman) moved that the Committee should complete its deliberations by Easter. At that time there was more than a month to Easter and no limit on the number of sittings that the Committee could have. He sought to firm up the programme for the Committee without putting a guillotine on the debate, as the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North (Mr. McNamara) implied. He sought to set a timetable which is completely different. On 17 March at the tenth sitting the hon. Member for St. Helens, South (Mr. Bermingham) proposed that the hon. Member for Newry and Armagh (Mr. Mallon) should attend the Committee and give oral evidence.

When first I heard that an hon. Member wished to give evidence to a Select Committee, I thought that we should yield to that request. The hon. Gentleman was asked to submit a written memorandum, giving his views and reasons why he wished to give oral evidence. He did and it is duly published in our report. When I saw his written representation I had to form the view that it was not the work of the Select Committee to hear those representations or to investigate that subject. The hon. Gentleman's memorandum states in paragraph 31 on page 259:

"It is recognised that I have a critical view of the UDR and I would now like an opportunity to make my case on that issue, on behalf of the people who elected me to do just that."

The Ministry of Defence answered that point in its memorandum in response to that of the hon. Gentleman, in paragraphs 6 and 9 on page 264, where it states:

"The UDR is subject, like the rest of the Army, to the disciplinary provisions of the Army Act 1955 and to the Queens Regulations: additionally, they are subject to the UDR Regulations. They are also, like all other Servicemen in the United Kingdom, subject to the ordinary criminal law . . .

The Army is well aware of some of the problems that can arise from contact between soldiers and the public in the difficult circumstances of Northern Ireland. There is, therefore, a well established procedure which members of the public can use if they feel that there is a reason to complain about the behaviour of any soldier."

The memorandum from the hon. Gentleman contained several specific allegations which could have been referred to Army disciplinary procedures, and some general points which were not appropriate for the Committee to pursue. The truth is that Opposition Members were seeking to use the wrong vehicle to pursue their special concern.

Mr. Bermingham: Does the hon. Gentleman not agree that in moving that the hon. Member for Newry and Armagh (Mr. Mallon) be heard, I simply said that the purpose of the hearing was to test the quality and extent of the evidence, and that judgment should not be made until that test had been carried out? Does he not agree that that seemed perfectly fair and proper?

Mr. Viggers: If the Committee, following its tenth session, had listened to the hon. Member for Newry and Armagh on the subject of the representations that he wished to make, it would have had no alternative but to balance that view with others, and would have plunged itself into an inquiry way beyond its function and duty. It was inappropriate for the Committee to investigate that subject.

As a result of the vote in the Committee, in which I did not take part, Opposition Members chose to boycott our eleventh sitting when the Bill was debated in detail and amendments could have been tabled. On 24 March at the twelfth sitting they produced amendments, but refused to speak to them, despite that fact that I pointed out that if they spoke in support of the amendments, they might be supported by Conservative Members. However, they chose not to do that. I suggested to the hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman), who I thought was submitting some very sensible and intelligent points, that if he wished to speak in support of his amendments, the Committee might be interested. He chose not to support those amendments.

Dr. Godman: Rubbish.

Mr. Viggers: The eleventh and twelfth sittings, on 19 March, were the occasions when the Committee should have amended the Bill and amended the Chairman's report, which subsequently became the Committee's report. By boycotting those sittings, the hon. Gentlemen and their party did themselves no service.

The evidence that we took——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I have exercised a great deal of tolerance, because I can understand that there are resentments arising from the Committee's proceedings that hon. Members want to express in the Chamber. However, it would be most regrettable—I do not think that I can allow it to happen—for the Third Reading debate to be a prolonged and acrimonious inquiry into what went on in Committee. I hope that we can now return to the Third Reading of the Bill.

Mr. Bermingham: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. There has been an attack upon the personalities of the Opposition Members who were members of the Committee, and the steps that they took. Surely they have a right to reply.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Hon. Members have a right to seek to catch my eye and to speak within the normal confines of debate on Third Reading.

Mr. Bermingham: On a further point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Is it not a fact that the Chairman of a Select Committee is meant to chair the Committee? It is not for the Chairman to attempt to direct and control the majority party upon that Committee.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It is not for me to rule on the conduct of members or Chairmen of Committees.

Mr. Viggers: The point of my remarks is to establish that the Committee has given proper consideration to the Bill and that it should therefore have a Third Reading. I submit that my remarks must be in order, in view of the comments and direct criticisms that have been made about my chairmanship of the Committee.

Mr. John McWilliam (Blaydon): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. It seems to me, on perusal of the standing orders, that the Chairman of a Select Committee does not have power to accept a guillotine or closure motion in the way that——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. We cannot now enter into a discussion about what happened or did not happen within a certain Committee. Those are not matters for me. We must return to the debate on Third Reading. I call Mr. Viggers.

Mr. Viggers rose——

Mr. McWilliam: Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. It does not seem to me to be in order for the House to finish consideration of a Bill which was considered by a Select Committee and improperly guillotined by that Select Committee. The House does not then have the opportunity properly to consider the full report that that Committee might have made.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I have already told the hon. Gentleman and the House that what went on in the Committee is not a matter for me. I cannot rule upon that.

Mr. Viggers: One specific allegation made by the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North was that I as Chairman prevented the Committee from discussing section 10 of the Crown Proceedings Act. There was an allegation that I went against the indication of Mr. Speaker because that point had been discussed on Second Reading. In view of that specific allegation——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. If the hon. Gentleman continues along that line I shall have no option but to allow all kinds of arguments to be put forward from all parts of the House in rebuttal of what he says. I am not prepared to allow that. We must return to Third Reading. On Third Reading, it is for the House to debate what is in the Bill. I hope that that is what we will do, and reach a conclusion on Third Reading.

Mr. Viggers: On the Third Reading of the Bill, we will notice that there is no reference to section 10 of the Crown Proceedings Act, and that is because I as Chairman was given the specific advice that that was outside the scope——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is doing what I have told him twice he may not do. We cannot now have a prolonged inquest on what went on in the Committee. We must confine our remarks to what is in the Bill. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will either do so or resume his seat.

Mr. Viggers: Thank you for your guidance, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

The Select Committee had several purposes, one of which was to produce the Bill. We are now debating the Third Reading of a Bill which includes matters relating to the rights of the accused, children at risk, new technology and the powers of military courts. Important points have been raised on all of those matters. I am proud of the Bill, and I am proud of the Select Committee. The Committee has carried out vital work and it is important that the Bill, which I hope will receive a Third Reading in a few minutes, will merit as much consideration as the Armed Forces Act 1981 about which the Select Committee stated in its conclusions:

"We note that the Ministry of Defence has in every case modified the rules of service discipline as recommended."

I am grateful for your indulgence, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and I hope that the Bill receives its Third Reading.

12.22 am

Mr. Wallace: I will bear in mind the ruling that you have already made, Mr. Deputy Speaker, about this being a Third Reading debate, although I note of course that there is a difference of opinion on that point between the Labour Opposition and the Government. I shared the frustration felt by the Opposition that the Select Committee which at the beginning had promise, did not grapple with some of the problems that hon. Members had hoped would be considered. For example, the problems contained in clause 2 of the Bill relating to the offence of interfering with equipment, messages or signals. I recall on Second Reading that the hon. Member for St. Helens, South (Mr. Bermingham) suggested at some length that perhaps there were provisions in clause 2 that could have been used—if the Bill were an Act—instead of the charges that were brought in the so-called Cyprus secrets trials. I do not entirely agree with the hon. Gentleman, but that point was worthy of further investigation.

Clause 2 comes before us now without the House having focused on the matter or having an opportunity to consider the outcome of the relevant parts of the Calcutt inquiry report. It was the Government's view that the Select Committee should report without the opportunity of discussing the Calcutt report. Those hon. Members who took part in the Second reading debate will recall that the Calcutt inquiry and the circumstances leading to that inquiry were referred to by nearly all the hon. Members who spoke. Unfortunately, the Select Committee was not allowed to have the benefit of the findings of that report and was not allowed to consider it.

Hon. Members reading the various parts of the Bill, not least clauses 2 and 3, will, as happens in many statutes, find some difficulty in understanding the complicated language. The hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman) tabled an amendment to the Select Committee report asking that leaflets should always be written in good, plain English. Such was the division on party lines that that amendment was rejected, it is not surprising, therefore, that complicated language exists in statutes.

Within the confines of Third Reading, I would like to express the frustration of the alliance, over the loss of this opportunity, which comes round only every five years properly to review the discipline procedures of the armed services. The Select Committee was also frustrated in that aim. Nevertheless, the Bill as it stands, despite the reservation I have already expressed on clause 11, will improve the service discipline Acts. The alliance will support the Bill, although we do not necessarily support all the procedures it contains.

Mr. Bermingham: I do not seek to trespass outside the remit of the Third Reading. The main issue is whether we can support the Bill. The tragedy of the Bill has been the way in which we have reached this position.

Bearing in mind all the points of order that we have had tonight and the rulings upon them, suffice it to say that I make no apologies for looking at the Bill now as a wasted opportunity. Those of us who spoke on Second Reading had thoughts, perhaps dreams, that we might have something to contribute to the argument. Fair enough. That is how democracy works. The conceit in the Bill—I put it as bluntly as that—has been the steam-roller tactics that have been applied to it.

At the end of the day we do not have the best result. It is against that background that I shall seek, if no one else does, to divide the House. Every hon. Member has a duty which transcends on occasions party affiliations, and that is to the House, to the country, and, above all, to democracy.

Of course, evidence was taken. On occasions questions were asked of witnesses. We cannot on Third Reading consider how those question sessions occurred, but we can at least say that if at the end of day one is to have a fair result, those who seek to ask questions should on occasions be allowed to do so. No one—I say that with the greatest respect for the Minister—has a monopoly of wisdom on either side of the House.

Yes, sometimes the Opposition are difficult because they ask questions and want to debate and change a little bit here and a little bit there. Of course, in a democracy it is not just the right to speak that is important, but the right to be heard. The tragedy of the Bill is that many voices have not been heard.

Yes, we have done things in certain ways for centuries. But why should we not have the right in 1986 to question, perhaps sometimes in a way that is inconvenient to Government? If we in Britain are ever denied that right, we do not have a democracy but the roll-over, tank-like dictatorship that we criticise so much elsewhere.

I notice that the hon. Member for Kettering (Mr. Freeman) laughs, but I warn the hon. Gentleman that there comes a time when sides change and one becomes Opposition rather than Government. When one finds oneself in that position, arrogance should go and reason should reign, because in that position one wants to make one's voice heard. People have, on occasions, to believe that they may have something to contribute to a debate.

I revert to where I began towards the end of last year. Clause 2 is about criminal damage and interfering with radio sets and other matters such as those which lay at the heart of the Cyprus inquiry. If my memory serves me correctly, I suggested on Second Reading that the drafting of that clause was open to some worry because it could have meant that people prosecuted under it could come before a court martial rather than an old Bailey jury. I believe that I asked whether the result of a court martial would be the same as a trial before an Old Bailey jury.

I gather from what I later read that people were wondering whether I was being critical of courts martial. Those who did not read all my remarks failed to realise that my question was whether, after the Bill had completed its passage through the House, we could be certain that the quality of justice before courts martial would be the same as the quality of justice at the Old Bailey or any other Crown court in the UK.

If the answer to that question is yes, we shall have achieved something. If it is that we cannot be sure, we shall have failed. That is why I spoke in the way I did in that debate and hoped to be selected, and was selected, to serve on the Special Select Committee.

The tragedy is that at the end of all our deliberations — and I make no apology for reaching a point of frustration when I walked out — I cannot say, as we leave the Bill, that the dream I had when the measure commenced its passage has been fulfilled. One can ask Ministry officials a thousand and one questions, but it requires the will of hon. Members, and sometimes their willingness to accept the ideas of others, to create legislation that gives rise to a system that is just and fair. I oppose the Bill now with considerable reluctance because I fear that we have not created a system that is fair.

12.32 am

Mr. Stanley: I am happy to commend the Bill for its Third Reading. The measure was thoroughly prepared in the Department before being brought before the House, having had a five-year gestation period. It was thoroughly studied in Committee, having occupied nearly twice as many sittings as the Bill that was before the 1981 Select Committee.

I was sorry to hear the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North (Mr. McNamara) speak about the Committee proceedings in the way he did. I cannot recall serving on a Select Committee when in Opposition when I was able virtually entirely to dictate the agenda of the Committee in the way in which that hon. Member did, or was able to dominate the verbal proceedings of the Committee in the way in which he and his hon. Friends were able to do.

The Select Committee was admirably chaired by my hon. Friend the Member for Gosport (Mr. Viggers). He conducted our proceedings with commendable efficiency. He showed unfailing courtesy to hon. Members on both sides, irrespective of party, giving every possible opportunity for them to put questions.

The Committee made some important recommendations for the future. They will all be studied carefully, as happened with the recommendations of the 1981 Committee, and each will be the subject of a considered response by the Government.

The Bill as it now appears before the House will meet the needs of the services and will, I am sure, have their confidence.

Schools (Brent)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Neubert.]

12.44 am

Mr. Reg Freeson (Brent, East): Brent schools are in crisis. This has been developing for years, but some schools are verging on breakdown. Teacher morale is sinking, partly because of the Government's pay policy but due also to political factions interfering in school administration and the abuse of so-called "anti-racism" in appointments and curricula. Parents are placing more than 20 per cent. of our children in schools outside the borough. Educational standards for more than 40 per cent. of our pupils are inadequate because of lack and loss of good staff and a failure to reorganise secondary schools, further education and training along comprehensive tertiary college lines.

In this short debate, I wish to deal with the physical conditions in which our pupils and teachers must work. They are a disgrace and they demand Government action. Infant schools, junior schools, secondary schools, colleges, special schools for handicapped youngsters, youth service and training school buildings are all at risk. The present decline in property maintenance and refurbishment is the cumulative effect of years of neglect even when Governments gave much more finance than they do now. But today it is so serious that soon part of the education service will have to close.

Council officers have drawn up a report on the condition of educational buildings which makes depressing and alarming reading. Some schools could be forced to close unless millions of pounds are found to repair them. This has already happened in two schools recently. Whole roofs and windows started to collapse. Only then was emergency action taken. Hundreds of infants and junior school children were evacuated to surplus secondary school rooms for months while urgent repairs were carried out.

More than £6·5 million worth of urgent work is needed in Brent schools. This includes re-roofing, mechanical and electrical repairs, replacing central heating and essential redecoration work. More than £1 million is needed for urgent roof replacements alone, yet present funds allow for only patching leaking roofs. Almost £2·5 million is needed for external and internal redecoration. Many schools have not been repainted for 15 to 20 years. In the condition of floors, windows, kitchens, wiring circuits and heating, the local education authority is in breach of the health and safety at work regulations. That is an important point. Government authority for capital spending and council revenue, backed by Government rate support grant, is not available to rectify this matter. So the law is broken, and our teachers, children and others are put at risk physically as well as educationally.

For years, I have expressed concern at the lack of planned maintenance in Brent—a problem that exists across the country. Even when Government support was far more than it is now, this was absent. When it should have been essential to good management, it was given low priority or none. Thus, essential work has always suffered first as resources were squeezed. In recent years, even less money has gone into maintenance in relation to need. This year, Brent has a budget of just more than £1 million. Remember the £6·5 million needed for urgent work. This year we have £1 million against the need for £6·5 million for urgent, essential work. I stress that it is essential, not just desirable.

A list of schools has been drawn up which could face closure unless major repairs are done. It includes primary schools, such as Bridge, Uxendon Manor, Barham, Lyon Park, Malorees and Sudbury, and secondary schools such as Claremont, John Kelly boys and John Kelly girls schools, Kingsbury, Sladebrook and Neasden. There are no funds for further and adult education colleges, toddlers' clubs and other children's facilities.

The minimum budget required for primary schools has been estimated at £325,000, yet only 15 per cent., or £48,000, is available. Similarly with secondary schools; just over £0·5 million is the minimum need, but only 15 per cent., or £75,000, is available. Much of the Kilburn polytechnic accommodation is substandard. The central block of the Willesden college of technology has already had to be closed while whole departments have to move indefinitely into temporary buildings which themselves will be very costly to maintain.

I could go on with more and more examples, but I have made my point. The resources available are inadequate for the needs identified. Not to recognise this and to act on it is a dereliction of duty. There is also general deterioration in Brent schools which has serious consequences for the future of education. It is wrong that staff and pupils should be forced to work in such poor, degrading conditions.

I have mentioned only the immediate problems. From what I have seen, I believe that the situation is even worse than has been reported. Apart from essential maintenance and repairs, there is a need for more general redecoration, refurbishment, new fixtures, fittings and re-equipment. Failure to meet that need now will mean that what is already a crisis will soon turn to disaster.

I have been driven to seek this Adjournment debate because of the inadequate responses to my pleas for more resources which I have so far had from the Secretary of State for Education and his Ministers. Instead of addressing the real problems and facing up to them, the Department has sent me generalised replies. I have been told:

"Much more could be done to improve the planning and management of repair and maintenance work."

I agree. I quote again:

"the Department . . . has published guidelines for determining maintenance priorities in the local authority sector and for setting up cost-effective maintenance programmes."

Fine.

"But the Government cannot of course direct local authorities how to spend their money."

Of course not.

"It is for each individual authority to decide its own priorities in the light of its assessment of local needs and circumstances."

In Brent's case the needs and the priorities have been identified. What Education Ministers have failed to answer is the fact that there are just not enough resources made available to tackle the urgent, essential needs which have been identified. This is the Government's responsibility. They control capital expenditure and also in large part rate and revenue spending. In other words, Ministers have never addressed the specific problems that I have put to them. In sum, these show an urgent need for much more capital expenditure to put educational buildings into a decent condition, and more revenue spending through the rates and the rate support grant for planned maintenance consistently for a number of years. Without that, the general advice received, which I have quoted, cannot possibly meet the case.

A committed policy by Brent for planned maintenance must be supported by properly programmed resources over several years by Government as well as council. Capital and revenue investment must be firm over a period. Generalised replies from Ministers are just not good enough. Nor is the failure by councillors to redirect money to this priority area. The real problems must be addressed and Brent's educational buildings given the resources they so desperately need.

The director of education and the director of works have identified and programmed essential works urgently required. I keep repeating the words "urgent" and "essential" and I mean them literally; they are not just being used for rhetorical purposes. They have made their report. What I plead for is joint action now by Government and council. Our pupils and our teachers cannot wait any longer. Many of the buildings will literally have to be closed. What do we do then, without the capital resources that I am pleading with the Minister, together with the council, to consider introducing into what is, after all, largely an inner-city area, about which so much is said by the Government and others but about which so little seems to be being done, at least in this field.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Science (Mr. Bob Dunn): I noted with interest comments of the right hon. Member for Brent, East (Mr. Freeson) and his realistic interpretation of historical events over many years. He will know, as I do, that the position that he has outlined tonight is essentially still, as it has been in the past, the result of a conflict between the cash allocation made by Governments of all parties and the establishment of local priorities. He was honest enough, and I give him fair and just credit for that, to admit that this problem has not just arisen but has been building up over a period of many years.

Before I turn to the particular problems of the London borough of Brent, I want to make it quite clear to the House that the Government have said on numerous occasions that their view is that local authorities should give priority to spending on the repair and maintenance of school buildings. More than that, there is scope for increased spending in this area, and that has been built into successive rate support grant settlements. Local authorities' own expenditure returns have shown that in real terms the rate of growth in spending on the repair and maintenance of the educational building stock has been considerable.

If the right hon. Gentleman will bear with me, and I know that he will be patient, I would like to make one or two comments for wider consumption than those on the particular interests he expressed tonight.

The House will know that between 1981-82 and 1984-85 spending nationally on the repair and maintenance of school buildings increased by some 13 per cent. Brent's own spending on primary and secondary school repairs and maintenance in 1984-85 was almost twice what it had been in 1981-82. In fact it showed an increase of 91 per cent. over the 1981-82 level. The year 1984-85 is the latest for which detailed expenditure data are available, but in their plans for local authority spending in both 1985-86 and, more recently, 1986-87, as set out in the 1986 public expenditure White Paper, the Government have allowed scope for authorities to continue to give some priority to repairs and maintenance provided they can contain costs generally and make efficiency savings whenever possible. Of course, it is for each local authority to determine its own priorities and it is not for Ministers to tell them how to spend their money.

[Mr. Bob Dunn]

Nevertheless, we are concerned about the physical state of some of the country's schools and we take very seriously the findings of Her Majesty's Inspectors and others that some schools are in a very poor state of repair. Indeed, in my own visits to local authorities up and down the country I have seen examples of such schools. I have no doubt that examples exist in the London borough of Brent.

I am aware also that many people, entirely understandably, would like to see more money made available to local authorities for capital building work and for repairs and maintenance. However, this wish needs to be balanced against what the country as a whole can afford and taken in the context of the Government's overall policy of constraining public expenditure in order to further reduce inflation and secure the sustained economic recovery which we would all like to see and on which all our public services depend.

The resources which are available for education depend on many factors, including the demands made by other services. For example, those services concerned with the elderly have demography on their side, whereas education, where pupil numbers fell by about 13 per cent. from 1980 to 1985, cannot reasonably be exempt from the overall policy of restraint. Nevertheless, despite falling numbers, spending on education has risen slightly in real terms. As the figures I gave earlier show, spending on repairs and maintenance has shown a substantial rise.

However, it is not only the amount of money that is spent that is important. How and where it is spent is equally crucial. It is for that reason, as I said before, that we look to authorities to make savings wherever possible. Poor management — the right hon. Member rightly referred to this—tends to result in money being spent where it is not needed. Such money is wasted. Audit Commission studies have shown where money might be saved, notably in areas such as caretaking and cleaning, and money saved here could clearly be spent on more important items such as repairing and maintaining school buildings—an investment which would be directly to the benefit of both pupils and teachers.

It is also worth saying that in many cases the decline in the state of the educational building stock has not come about suddenly. I note the right hon. Gentleman's realistic comments. Rather, it has been a gradual decline, brought about as a result of inadequate spending on repairs and maintenance over many years. What authorities often lack —this is the case, as the right hon. Gentleman said, in the London borough of Brent—is a planned programme of maintenance for their school buildings. In order to carry out the complex task of managing their building stock with maximum efficiency, local authorities need adequate information about their educational building stock and objective methods for assessing maintenance needs and determining priorities.

I turn now to capital expenditure generally and as it affects the London borough of Brent. Each year the Department invites all local education authorities to submit details of their plans for capital expenditure in their following year at the county and voluntary schools in the area. In aggregate, these plans always exceed what the country can, in our view, afford. We therefore measure each authority's bids against certain criteria to determine what allocation each should receive.

The first step is to take into account authorities' commitments on projects which are already under way. This element of the allocation will generally not exceed the provisional indication of acceptable commitments of which the authority has been notified the previous year. The next priority is to cover expenditure needed to permit authorities to meet their statutory duties to provide sufficient schools for their area and to implement proposals approved by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science under sections 12 to 15 of the Education Act 1980, generally involving the removal of surplus places. All allocations have covered these items in full. The third priority is expenditure on smaller, non-statutory, projects to remove surplus places and to renovate or replace unsatisfactory or inappropriate school buildings. Allocations here are made on a basis which reflects the number of sub-standard places in each authority, as well as their planned expenditure. This sort of work is covered to the extent that the overall level of resources will permit.

Allocations for 1986-87 represent, in aggregate, 43 per cent. of local education authorities' planned capital expenditure on schools. Authorities are — this is an important point which relates to Brent — free to supplement these allocations by the use of the permitted proportion of their capital receipts and by the other flexibilities available to them under the Local Government, Planning and Land Act 1980.

The allocation made to Brent was determined on that basis. On the schools side, its expected commitments for projects already under way were met in full and, so far as new work is concerned, the planned cost of enlargements to the Brentfield and Leopold schools were allowed in full also. Similarly, the capital costs of the alterations needed to Willesden high school resulting from the closure of the Pound street annex were fully taken into account. Brent's total allocation for 1986-87 is £1,589,000. This represents a rather lower percentage of their planned expenditure than the national average, but, as a percentage of the total sum allocated nationally, it corresponds fairly closely to Brent's school population as a percentage of the national total. Statistics can, of course, prove anything. What is important is that the allocations to all authorities were made by applying exactly the same criteria and priorities. Brent was not singled out in any way for exceptionally harsh treatment.

I am well aware that local education authorities would like to spend even more on capital work. However, there is a continuing need to control gross public expenditure in the fight against inflation. I have to point out also that the London borough of Brent has not helped itself in that it has done nothing about the considerable number of surplus places in its secondary schools. I appreciate that the present administration's proposals for school amalgamations were quashed in the High Court but, before then, under Labour control, no action at all was taken.

There are two further areas to which I should like to direct the attention of the House and the right hon. Gentleman, in which the authority could have had useful scope for savings in educational expenditure — school meals and caretaking and cleaning. Because of the lateness of the hour, I shall not go into detail, but I think that the right hon. Gentleman will accept that there is considerable scope for Brent to achieve substantial efficiency savings in its school meals and secondary caretaking costs. Money saved here could clearly be targeted towards genuine educational priority, such as repairs and maintenance.

These are areas in which the authority might like to help itself. But my reference to them is by no means intended to disparage the authority's overall performance. The figures show that Brent's response to falling pupil numbers has been to reduce teacher numbers faster than the average for the outer London boroughs and the rates for England as a whole.

I have listened with great interest to the right hon. Gentleman. I hope that he fully understands the arguments we have put forward.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at eight minutes past One o'clock.

House of Commons

Friday 11 April 1986

The House met at half-past Nine o'clock

PRAYERS

[MR. SPEAKER in the Chair]

PETITIONS

Transport and General Workers Union (Retired Members)

9.35 am

Mr. Kevin McNamara (Kingston upon Hull, North): I wish to present a petition to the House on behalf of the retired members of the Transport and General Workers Union in my district. The petition reads as follows:

To the honourable the Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain, and Northern Ireland in Parliament assembled. The humble petition of Retired members of the Transport and General Workers Union in the City of Kingston upon Hull sheweth.

That the legislation based on the "Reform of Social Security" —"Programme for Action" White Paper would be extremely detrimental to the residents of the United Kingdom who are in receipt of Social Security benefits. Wherefore your petitioners pray that your honourable House do not pass legislation arising out of the "Reform of Social Security" White Paper. And your petitioners as in duty bound will ever pray, etc.

The list of signatures is headed by Mr. Jack Webster, president of the retired branch of the Transport and General Workers Union in my area, and contains over 1,600 signatures. Although the Government may not do much about the matter, following the result in Fulham yesterday, we can be sure that the next Labour Government will remedy the defects of this legislation.

To lie upon the Table.

Radioactive Waste Storage

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby): The petition that I wish to present reads as follows:

The humble petition of the people of Great Grimsby showeth that the undersigned are totally and absolutely opposed to any proposal to locate any radioactive waste storage or disposal facility within the County of Humberside and consider that any such facility would relegate the area designating it as more suitable for dangerous dumping than for development.

Wherefore your Petitioners pray that your Honourable House will under no circumstances approve a Special Development Order allowing preliminary site exploration or associated works in connection with the storage or disposal of radioactive waste in Humberside and will take all such other action within the powers of the House to prevent a national radioactive waste storage or disposal facility being established in Humberside.

The petition has been signed by just over 300 signatories who stand four square with the petitioners from the other three areas threatened with nuclear waste dumping in asking the Department of the Environment to listen to the advice of the Select Committee on the Environment and not to proceed with a special development order, and in asking the House, if the Department decides to proceed, to reject it.

To lie upon the Table.

Mr. Nicholas Lyell (Mid-Bedfordshire): I have the honour to present the humble petition of the citizens of the counties of Bedfordshire, Cambridgeshire and Buckinghamshire in the vicinity of Elstow, in my constituency, to the effect that the Nuclear Industry Radioactive Waste Executive proposals to place radioactive nuclear waste at Elstow should be rejected.

Wherefore your Petitioners pray that your Honourable House do urge the Secretary of State for the Environment to reject any such proposal by NIREX and to prevent any such deposit of radioactive waste in Bedfordshire.

The petition is signed by no fewer than 96,000 of my constituents and constituents in the constituencies of my hon. Friends the Members for Bedfordshire, North (Sir T. Skeet), for Bedfordshire, South-West (Mr. Madel), for Cambridgeshire, South-West (Sir A. Grant), for Luton, North (Mr. Carlisle) and for Luton, South (Mr. Bright) and for constituencies in Buckinghamshire. It shows the overwhelming opposition in the area to these misguided proposals.

To lie upon the Table.

BILL PRESENTED

LOCAL AUTHORITY FINANCE ETC.

Mr. Galley presented a Bill to provide that a local authority in any one year may raise rates by no more than 5 per cent. above the increase in the Retail Price Index prevailing on 1st January in the calendar year in which rates are set; to provide that the Secretary of State shall have regard to the level of rates set by a local authority in distributing rate support grant; to make provision for local authorities to put out to tender a range of services which they have a duty to provide; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 9 May and to be printed. (b) the statement is still maintained by the authority at whichever is the earlier of the following times, namely—

(i) the time when they institute the first annual review of the statement following the child's fourteenth birthday, and

(ii) any time falling after that birthday when they institute a re-assessment of his educational needs.

the authority shall at that time require the appropriate officer to give to the authority his opinion as to whether the child is or is not a disabled person.

(2) Where—

(a) a local education authority make any such statement in respect of a child after he has attained the age of 14, or

(b) a local education authority maintain any such statement in respect of a child in whose case the appropriate officer has, in pursuance of subsection (1), given his opinion that the child is not a disabled person, but the authority have become aware of a significant change in the mental or physical condition of the child giving them reason to believe that he may now be a disabled person.

the authority shall, at the time of making the statement or (as the case may be) of becoming aware of that change, require the appropriate officer to give to the authority his opinion as to whether the child is or is not a disabled person.

(3) Not later than nine months before the presumed date on which a disabled child will cease to receive full time education provided by or on behalf of a local education authority, the authority shall, with the consent of the disabled child (or where the child is under 16 or is incapable of giving consent with the consent of his parent or guardian inform the appropriate officer of that date.

(4) When the appropriate officer receives information from a local education authority in accordance with the preceding subsection he shall make arrangements for an assessment of the needs of the disabled child for the provision by the authority of which he is an officer of any statutory services for that child in accordance with any of the welfare enactments within a period of not more than six months.

(5) In this section—

(b) in relation to the Inner London Education Authority, means such officer as may be appointed for the purposes of this section by the authority which is the local authority for the purposes of that Act for the area in which the child referred to in subsection (1) or (2) is ordinarily resident; and

"child" means a person of compulsory school age or a person who has attained that age but not the age of 19 and is registered as a pupil at a school or a college of further education; and

"disabled child" means a child who the appropriate officer has informed a local education authority is in his opinion a disabled person in accordance with subsections (1) and (2) above; and expressions used in the Education Act 1944 have the same meaning in this section as in that Act.

Provided that the provisions of subsection (4) above shall apply notwithstanding that the disabled person has attained the age of 19.

(6) This section applies to England and Wales only.'.—[Mr. Tom Clarke.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Tom Clarke (Monklands, West): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss the following:

New clause 2 — Duty of education authority to ascertain whether children with special educational needs are disabled: Scotland—

New clause 3—Assessment and recording of children and young persons.

New clause 7 — Duty of education authority to ascertain whether children with special educational needs are disabled—

Amendment No. 3.

9.40 am

Mr. Clarke: I welcome Ministers to the Front Bench. Much work has gone into the Bill, both in Committee and elsewhere, and I thank hon. Members on both sides of the House for that. I hope that with a bit of common sense and tidiness we can produce a Bill that will in due course obtain its Third Reading and thus do a great deal for the disabled, their carers and their families.

New clause 12 is important and is based on the discussion that we have had. I move it in the knowledge that time is perhaps not on our side because of the many issues that we must discuss. If possible, I shall speak for no more than five minutes on each issue. Indeed, if that was the pattern for the day, I for one would not complain. I know that hon. Members have strong views on many of the issues and I appreciate the fact that so many hon. Members have stayed for this debate on a Friday. But it is important to try to achieve our ends before 2.30 pm in order to facilitate the Bill's Third Reading.

The Government conducted a consultation exercise. It is only fair to point out that the response to that and to the Government's consultative documents was overwhelmingly in favour of the Bill and against the Government's proposals. Of course, that might be expected on the part of organisations of and for disabled people which had been closely involved in drafting the Bill and in giving their assistance. But I am sure that the Government were surprised by the strength of support for key clauses from health authorities, professional bodies and the local authority associations.

In Committee, I said that I would make up my own mind on amendments for the Report stage following the responses received. The new clauses and amendments that I have tabled reflect that view. I acknowledge that the Government's amendments represent a modest improvement on the position in the consultation paper, but they are still not quite good enough and do not go as far as the Bill's sponsors would like. That is why I have tabled various new clauses and amendments.

As I have said throughout the passage of the Bill, there are certain key principles in the Bill, to which the House gave an unopposed Second Reading on 17 January, which must be retained if the Bill is to have any meaning. The first concerns new clause 12, which finds the Government on very weak ground. The Government new clause 7 merely retains a procedure for notification by the social services to the education department that a child is disabled at 14 plus. There is a unanimous view among those responsible for social services that an assessment can and should be undertaken by them before the child leaves full-time education.

9.45 am

I shall quote two responses which are important in their own right but which also encapsulate many of the views expressed in response to the Government's documents. The Association of County Councils said about the new clause:

"This probably is the area where the Association has least difficulty with the proposals in the Bill itself . . . The Association has recently responded favourably to the notion of 'shared care' for children with special educational needs, and it seems logical for this to be a relationship which extends into adulthood. The Association's main difficulty relates simply to the number of formal notifications required."

The Association of Directors of Social Services said:

"Joint assessment at this stage involves collaborative forward planning which is highly desirable at the critical point in the life of the young person to whom the support and familiarity of the educational environment are lost, and where continuity of service availability is, in consequence, especally important."

New clause 12 is the next logical step after the Education Act 1981. I have read the responses carefully, as have my hon. Friends and my advisers have spent considerable time with the officials of the ACC and Association of Metropolitan Authorities in an effort to meet their concerns. I hope that the Government will recognise the concessions that I have made in reducing what they describe as the bureaucracy and the number of contacts between authorities. The proposed time-scale for notification has been reduced in the new clause from 12 months before leaving school to nine months. That means the beginning of a child's last year at school. The social services are given six months rather than three in which to undertake the assessment.

Furthermore clause 3(3) which requires further reports from education authorities to social service departments has been completely dropped. I believe that the associations are now happy with the clause, and they appear to accept that the resource implications are minimal. I estimate that the average social service department may have to undertake no more than 20 assessments a year as a result of the clause, and many of the children may already be receiving services. The clause will ensure that the major change in their lives and the period of great trauma for their families will be properly planned and prepared.

The Minister will doubtless say that my new clause is defective. However, he may have had second thoughts on rereading it. I admit that we had difficulty in drafting the provisions in relation to people leaving full-time education at 19, when technically they may no longer be children. But this small group of young people in special colleges of further education is vital, as the Minister will appreciate from the BBC programme in which he appeared yesterday. Most of these colleges are run by charities with sponsoring from education departments or, occasionally, the social services, and in those circumstances it is unfortunately too easy for them to be ignored by local authorities until they arrive back full time with their parents at 19. If the House accepts the new clause, I hope that the Minister will assist in preparing any technical amendments that may be needed in the other place.

Finally, I must refer briefly to new clauses 2 and 3. New clause 2 is the Scottish equivalent of new clause 7. In the time available I have not been able to draft an equivalent to new clause 12. If new clause 12 is accepted, I hope that the Government will assist in its extension to Scotland when the matter is debated in the other place. New clause 3, which stands in the name of the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland, the hon. Member for Argyll and Bute (Mr. MacKay), is a small improvement which I am happy to include in the Bill without debate.

In that spirit, I commend the new clause.

Mr. Peter Thurnham (Bolton, North-East): I congratulate the hon. Member for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke) on the way in which he has brought the Bill through its Committee stage and on the amount of work that he has put in, in detailed consultation on the necessary amendments and new clauses. He had good fortune in coming first in the ballot and has introduced a most welcome Bill.

Even if the resources that the Government are prepared to devote are fewer than had perhaps been hoped for, the hon. Gentleman has still done extremely well to get the Government's backing which, indeed, we hope will materialise today. I have heard the figure of £25 million being quoted as the cost of resources agreed, and for a private Member's Bill to secure that amount of backing must be a matter of pride for the hon. Gentleman.

I also congratulate the Government on having found resources to help make this Bill possible, even if not at the level hoped for. It is all in a good cause. As the Prime Minister said yesterday, the Government have a record of increasing expenditure for the chronically sick and disabled, and various measures have meant substantial increases in expenditure, to a total of £4·5 million for the chronically sick and disabled.

I support new clause 12, as moved by the hon. Member for Monklands, West. Without it, all we are doing is looking at a paper chase. It is most important that assessments are made. Whenever disabled people come out of hospital at any stage of their life, an assessment is necessary, particularly in the case of younger children. About 1,000 children are still in long-stay mental hospitals. Plans are desperately needed for placing those children in the community.

I ask the Minister to give special attention to the need to provide sufficient back-up and after care. If families are to provide adoptive or foster homes for children who are severely handicapped, they need to know that sufficient back-up care is available to help them in their task. We fostered a boy nearly three years ago; it is his 11th birthday today. Even if the £100 million requested was a bit much, it is a welcome birthday present of £25 million that the Minister has given to him and people in a similar situation. I commend the clause to the House and hope that it meets with approval.

Mr. Alfred Morris (Manchester, Wythenshawe): The Opposition support new clause 12. On new clause 2, the Scottish equivalent of new clause 7, my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) will speak briefly as the debate proceeds. I think it will be well if all of us can take as our principal text for debates on this humane and much needed Bill a statement of Professor Mittler. Few people anywhere have done more than he has to help severely handicapped children and their families. He is a former adviser of the Secretary of State for Social Services. Writing to the right hon. Gentleman on 7 April, Professor Mittler said:

"To let this Bill fall or be talked out would be unforgivable."

That is my view and it is endorsed by professional opinion, and by all the voluntary organisations that the Government have consulted on the Bill. What it requires from both sides of the House today is, first, brevity, and, secondly, a resolve to ensure that, whatever differences may exist, a Bill as strong and viable as possible must emerge from our debates.

New clause 12 is but a modest step forward about which there has been full consultation with the AMA and the ACC, which are not concerned with the expenditure implications. In Standing Committee, even to mention the word resources, was like swearing in church. I hope it will be found less reprehensible here on the Floor of the House. As I say, the new clause is modest in its effects. I hope very much that the House will approve it unanimously.

Mr. Jack Ashley (Stoke-on-Trent, South): I intervene briefly to say that I was glad to hear the comment of the hon. Member for Bolton, North-East (Mr. Thurnham), because he has direct personal experience of the problems of disability. However, I would be out of order in following him on the general question of what this Government have accomplished, as compared with the previous Government. That is not what we should be discussing today; we should discuss only this Bill and, at present, the new clause, which I commend. We disagree strongly on the record of this Government as compared with the previous one.

On this Bill, I expect no basic disagreement; I hope we are working together in this case.

I hope that new clause 12 will be accepted because, without the assessment, disabled children leaving school will be left in a vacuum at the most important time of their lives. The case for new clause 12 is overwhelming. I was sorry indeed to see new clause 7 presented by the Government. If the Minister would accept new clause 12, I can assure him he would be doing something for which legislation should not really be required. It should be automatic for disabled children to be assessed when they leave school. But we do need legislation for what should be automatic, so I hope that the Minister will accept new clause 12 as an imperative necessity.

The Minister for Health (Mr. Barney Hayhoe): I am very grateful to the hon. Member for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke), who has carried this Bill forward with great skill and a constructive attitude that augurs extremely well for the chances of getting it on the statute book. I share his hope that the Bill will be given a Third reading today, and I acknowledge the way in which he has responded to the points I made on behalf of the Government at Second reading, during Committee, in the process of consultation, and on the the many occasions on which we have discussed between us the best way to proceed. I shall quickly explain the Government's position in relation to the clause in the Bill, the new clause proposed by the Government, and the new clause proposed by the hon. Gentleman.

The provisions of the Bill as drafted would require local education authorities to record, on any statement of special education need made under the Education Act 1981 in respect of a child aged 13-plus—at which age there is a statutory reassessment of need—whether the child is, in the opinion of the social services department, a disabled person. If so, and if the young person or his representative agrees, the Social Services department is to be notified not later than 12 months before the expected date of leaving full-time education. The Social Services department is to be notified again three months before the anticipated leaving date, and given details of further education and training which would, in the view of the local education authority, be appropriate for him or her.

On receipt of this last notification, social services departments would be required to carry out a full assessment of the young person's needs. The Government accept the need for close liaison between LEAs and SSDs. However, focusing on the mandatory reassessment age of 13-plus means that a number of children assessed or reassessed between 12½ and 13½ would be excluded. This is a technical difficulty associated with the original clause. Recording information about disability on the statement kept by the LEA would be inappropriate, as it would have no direct relevance to the child's educational needs. The elaborate procedures for passing information from LEAs to SSDs would place a burden on LEAs.

For those reasons, the Government have put forward their amendment to new clause 7. That would remove the proposed duties on LEAs to pass on specific information to SSDs about disabled children and on the SSDs to assess the needs of disabled school leavers. Instead of that, the LEAs would be required to seek advice from the SSD about whether the child is disabled in his or her 15th year, either as part of the mandatory reassessment or the first annual review of the statement, whichever is the sooner; to obtain such advice from the SSD in respect of a child over 14 being assessed for the first time; and to seek a further opinion in respect of children whose mental and physical condition has changed and for whom revised advice may be appropriate. The procedure should certainly secure better liaison between LEAs and SSDs at a time more likely to provide information relevant to the child's needs on leaving full-time education.

New clause 12 follows the basic structure of the Government's proposed new clause 7, but in addition would require—the hon. Gentleman lays great stress on this — local education authorities to inform social services departments of the cessation of full-time education nine months before the presumed date. From my consultations with the Department of Education and Science experts, perhaps eight months would be a more administratively sensible point. However, this is a highly technical matter which can easily be resolved later. The new clause would also require, where such information is received by a social services department, an assessment of need to be undertaken within six months.

There are a number of problems with the proposed new clause which to some extent, have been shown in the comments we have received from the ACC. The ACC broadly agrees that new clause 12 is a satisfactory replacement for new clause 3, but would prefer the determination of disability and the assessment to be rolled into a single requirement in order to reduce the administrative burden on LEAs. That seems to be a sensible proposition.

The ACC suggests that if that approach commends itself to the House, an appropriate amendment can be tabled at a later stage, and I agree. To set the general spirit of co-operation and constructive work which, I hope, will animate all our proceedings today, I shall not press new clause 7. I shall accept new clause 12 on the basis that we shall need to have further discussions. I hope that the hon. Member for Monklands, West and his advisers will join local authorities in considering the technical matters. Far be it from me to trespass on Scottish territory, but as I understand it, new clause 2 is the equivalent, for Scotland, of new clause 7. I imagine that my hon. Friend the Minister with responsibility for health in Scotland will take a similar view, and will not go ahead with new clause 2. Equally, that matter will have to be considered.

Mr. Tom Clarke rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. Is the hon. Gentleman seeking to address the House again?

Mr. Clarke: The Minister with typical generosity has given way. In the interests of making progress with the Bill, Mr. Deputy Speaker, you may wish me to say that the Minister's comments are extremely helpful. He accepts the principle of new clause 12 which, as hon. Members will agree, represents considerable progress. He made valid administrative points which I accept, and I agree that further consultation will be necessary. I am delighted to accept the representations and views expressed by the Minister.

Mr. Hayhoe: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his intervention. I shall draw my remarks to a close because we have a great deal of work to do. I hope that I have made it absolutely clear that the Government do not intend to seek to delay the Bill by procedural devices. Providing the spirit that has animated these early exchanges, and, indeed, private conversations, continues, I see no reason why we should not make good progress, and send the Bill to another place later this afternoon.

I made it clear to the hon. Gentleman in my letter, in which I set out the series of Government amendments following the consultation exercise, that the consultation exercise had shown the resource implications of the Government's proposals to be rather greater than had been anticipated, and that it would be necessary to use the commencement order procedures in the Bill to activate those parts of the Bill when the resources are available to meet them. Indeed, it is on that basis that the LEAs have been giving their views. My hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, North-East (Mr. Thurnham) may have misunderstood the position, that the present public expenditure arrangements do not include provisions for the Bill. That has been recognised by my hon. Friend the Member for Exeter (Mr. Hannam) whose work in his leading role in the all-party disablement group is well known to the House. If I recall rightly, on the Tuesday before Easter he raised that specific point at Question Time, and I responded by saying that it would be necessary to behave in that way regarding resources.

Today we are dealing with the legislative provision, and the resources question is separate. We will follow the normal procedures of the House, if today we concentrate on the legislative provision, although one can never be unmindful of the resource implications.

Mr. Thurnham: Have the Government been able to quantify the savings that would result from a reduction in crisis interventions, and also from a reduction in the number of people in institutional care, if the provisions can be made to work properly? Costs can be incurred at a level of £19,000 a year in looking after a handicapped child in an institution.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I hope that we can confine our remarks to the new clause.

Mr. Hayhoe: Mr. Deputy Speaker, you almost take the words from my mouth. Perhaps I should merely reiterate your wise advice. My hon. Friend tempts me to debate the very areas which I have just said seem inappropriate for me to deal with. All the resource implications, both on the plus and the minus sides, will need to be examined much more carefully as a result of our work today, what happens in another place, and when the legislation as now envisaged is enacted. However, I felt it necessary to make the resource point which I had set out in my letter to the hon. Member for Monklands, West, copies of which were sent to all Committee members. There was no secret about it.

Mrs. Elaine Kellett-Bowman (Lancaster): My right hon. Friend referred to our hon. Friend the Member for Exeter (Mr. Hannam). Is he aware that our hon. Friend was extremely anxious to be present but had an unavoidable appointment elsewhere?

Mr. Hayhoe: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, and I had intended to say that, because our hon. Friend made that point to me. I know how active he has been in discussions about the Bill, and what a constructive attitude he has adopted. It is only because of a most pressing engagement in his constituency that he is unable to be present.

Sir Nicholas Bonsor (Upminister): Having served on the Committee, I intervene briefly to welcome the attitude of my right hon. Friend the Minister to the new clause. I was a little worried that he might allow the resource implications to override his better judgment and so feel unable to support new clause 12. It is a great relief to many Conservative Members, as well as Labour Members, that he has given his support.

I wish to tempt providence a tiny bit by mentioning resources. When the Bill is passed, I hope that my right hon. Friend will make every effort to find the necessary resources. I am slightly anxious especially about the new clause. Once it has been recognised that it is necessary for the steps to be taken, it would be wrong for the Government unnecessarily to delay their implementation. I hope that my right hon. Friend the Minister will note that that view is expressed from the Conservative Benches and not by the Opposition.

I completely accept what my right hon. Friend said about the administrative details. I will not examine his comments in great detail, but I know that much discussion has taken place among those who are much better qualified than I on the precise wording of new clause 12 to obtain the necessary support for those who come out of full time local education systems and to ensure a continuing care programme. I believe that some minor adjustments will be necessary. However, I completely welcome the new clause and wish the hon. Member for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke) every success with the remainder of his Bill.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. John MacKay): I should like to say a few words about new clauses 2 and 3. In the light of the comment of my right hon. Friend the Minister for Health about new clause 7, what I shall say about new clause 2 will be a great deal less than it might otherwise have been.

New clause 2 would have had substantially the same effect in Scotland as new clause 7 has for England and Wales. Clause 3 of the Bill as originally drafted, was based upon legislation that applies to England and Wales. The Bill simply sought to apply that to Scotland without amendment. However, the legislation on special educational needs differs substantially between England and Wales on the one hand and Scotland on the other. A separate provision is therefore required if that part of the Bill is to be applied in Scotland.

New clause 2 would have paralleled new clause 7, but, as my right hon. Friend has explained, the Government have decided not to move new clause 7 but to agree to new clause 12. In the light of that, I will not move new clause 2 but I shall have to arrange for a parallel provision to be introduced in another place to ensure that there is some application to Scotland, and that that is equivalent to new clause 12 as new clause 2 would have been for new clause 7. The House must fully understand that I shall not move new clause 2 but I shall arrange in another place, for a parallel provision to be moved to the new clause accepted by my right hon. Friend.

Mr. Tom Clarke: Before the Under-Secretary of State for Scotland concludes his speech, will he accept that I welcome his comments as warmly as I welcomed the comments of his right hon. Friend earlier?

Mr. John MacKay: I thank the hon. Gentleman for that comment.

I should like to say a few words about new clause 3 as I know that the House wants to make progress. The provisions of the Education (Scotland) Act 1980, as amended, deal with children with special educational needs and are generally effective. However, improvements can always be made in the light of experience, and the Bill provides the opportunity to make four minor but not unimportant changes. That is the purpose of new clause 3.

The first proposal in subsection (2) is simple. It seeks to amend section 4 of the Education (Scotland) Act 1980 so that the child guidance service should in future be called the regional or island authority psychological service. The reason for that is that the benefits of the service are not confined to children. Child guidance clinics are also attended by young persons up to the age of 19 and the definition of those clinics as child guidance clinics can put 17, 18 and 19-year-olds off the idea of attending such clinics.

10.15 am

Subsection (3) and the amendments that we propose to section 61 of the 1980 Act set out the elements of the examination and assessment of a child which must be undertaken before that child may be recorded as having special educational needs. There are three elements there. First, there must be a medical examination, secondly there must be a psychological examination and finally a report must be made by a teacher who has been involved in the education of the child. We intend to replace the need for three reports with a single process of observation assessment which must include educational, psychological and medical components. The purpose of that is to bring the legislation into line with the best current professional practice where it is accepted that children are best observed over a period and in the classroom rather than assessed on the basis of separate examinations. Although the proposal is unavoidably a lengthier process, it provides for a much more complete picture of the child and the child's needs. That will strengthen the legislation, not weaken it.

The amendments contained in subsection (4) concern the appointment of the named person. The named person is someone appointed by the education authority under section 62 of the 1980 Act to whom parents of children may go for advice and information about the child's special educational needs. The concept of the named person is a good one. However, that provision has been a source of irritation in cases where parents are capable of looking after the best interests of a child. In such circumstances the parents may resent the statutory imposition of an outsider in their family affairs.

I have some sympathy with that point of view and I can understand such feelings. I therefore propose that in future parents should be given the opportunity to tell an education authority that they do not wish to have a person appointed to assist them. I envisage that in the majority of cases the appointment of the named person will continue to be appropriate. The amendment provides for those cases where it is not. It will be necessary for parents explicitly to opt out of the appointment of a named person.

I should now like to consider the correction of an anomoly in section 63(1) of the 1980 Act where a right is given to parents to appeal against the decision to record their child, against the terms of the record, against the nominated school and against the refusal of a placing request. There is, however, no right of appeal against an authority's decision not to record a child. That is unjust because it denies a right of appeal against the action of an authority which in effect may deny a child the very considerable benefits that can flow from the recording a special educational need. That position should be corrected. Such a right of appeal already exists in England and Wales and by inserting a new subsection (aa) into section 63 by the amendment contained in subsection (5), Scottish parents will be given a similar right.

The amendment proposed in subsection (6) to section 64 of the 1980 Act is a technical amendment. It follows from the amendment of section 63(1).

I apologise for speaking at length, but I thought it appropriate to explain the series of amendments arising from our decision that some reform was needed of the law on educational provision for children with special needs. I hope that the hon. Member for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke) and the House will agree to accept the new clause.

Mr. Donald Dewar (Glasgow, Garscadden): I reassure the House that there is no question of the Scottish team on the Opposition Front Bench doing a double act throughout the day with my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe (Mr. Morris). Indeed, there is only one other point of importance to Scotland in which I might like to intervene later in the proceedings.

I shall speak briefly as we wish to expedite the business and so make progress. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke) on his considerable success today and on the promotion of this important Bill. I thought that the Minister had a slight edge in his voice when he thanked my hon. Friend for his intervention. I suspect that that is a compliment to the tenacity, persistence and the cutting edge of the representations and lobbying that have been carried out. There has been a suggestion of a dragging of feet and a reluctance in the Scottish Office over taking the open and generous view that the Bill deserves. I am delighted that new clause 2 is not being moved and that new clause 12 is accepted in principle by the Scottish Office and by the Minister's colleagues south of the Border. That represents an important change of heart by the Government which the Opposition greatly welcome.

I should like to make a point that has universal application to the Scottish Office. There are clearly resource implications in new clause 12, however it may be redrafted and tied up in administrative terms. The Opposition welcome that, as the resources will be put to an important use and will be most helpful. However, we hope that the Government will be prepared to live constructively with such resource implications and recognise that they cannot be accepted at the expense of other social work services or services for the disabled. I hope that that will be borne in mind when the strange alchemy of the rate support grant for Scotland is finalised in future.

However, I believe that the Government have made a sensible concession to sound common sense and to the experience of many people who have had practical experience of such work.

In connection with new clause 3, I intend to follow the admirable brevity of my hon. Friend the Member for Monklands, West and note that it has been read most adequately into the record by the Minister, who suffers from the delusion that people read his speeches. I simply say that the Opposition welcome that new clause.

Mr. Tim Yeo (Suffolk, South): I had hoped to catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, before my right hon. Friend the Minister for Health and my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Scotland made their speeches. I am glad that I did not, because I can be briefer than I would have been.

I warmly welcome the response of the Minister for Health in accepting the new clause. It shows the constructive spirit which has informed the negotiations between the Bill's sponsor and the Minister. I congratulate the hon. Member for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke) and my right hon. Friend on their progress. I welcome the new clause also because it will help the group of young people who have suffered in the past.

I know from my experience that many youngsters who have been given special education and made great progress physically and mentally and to whom considerable resources have been devoted have often dropped out of the system on leaving school. Considerable distress has been caused to their families by the reversal in their progress. To a great extent, the professional and other efforts made while those children were at school have been wasted. The new clause will ensure that the progress made at the school is not lost.

Mr. Eric Forth (Mid-Worcestershire): I did not serve on the Committee, but I have a great interest in the Bill. I join those hon. Members who have congratulated the hon. Member for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke) on introducing the Bill. I follow the comments of my hon. Friends the Members for Upminster (Sir N. Bonsor) and for Suffolk, South (Mr. Yeo) in emphasising to my right hon. Friend the Minister for Health that those of us who may from time to time take a slightly parsimonious attitude to Government matters are anxious that all the resources needed should be found to fulfil the agreed measures behind this important Bill.

I add my voice to those of other Conservative Members who give their support in seeking the resources needed to fulfil the Bill's excellent objectives. I hope that my right hon. Friend will use that message as he sees fit.

Mr. Hayhoe: I am advised that there probably need not be any delay in implementing the new clause. I hope that its provisions will apply soon.

To avoid doubt in this complicated group of measures, I point out that new clause 12 will be accepted by me and, I hope, my colleagues. New clauses 2 and 7 will not be moved. New clause 3 will be moved and, I hope, accepted. Amendment No. 3 will be moved and I hope, accepted.

Mrs. Kellett-Bowman: I, too, should like to congratulate the hon. Member for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke) on introducing the Bill. I thank my right hon. Friend the Minister for Health for accepting new clause 12, because it will fill a gap faced by parents of children in this position.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause read a Second time, and added to the Bill.

Amendment No. 4.

Mr. Clarke: New clause 11 deals with an extremely important aspect — the problem of persons leaving hospital. Our objective is to require assessment before discharge from hospital for people who have received in-patient treatment for mental disorder for at least six months. We pursued that matter in Committee. The new clause attempts to reflect some of the responses we received.

The Times of 17 February this year stated:

"A doctor should not discharge a patient before satisfying himself that there is a satisfactory pattern of living awaiting him . . . No individual should be discharged into a situation where services do not exist".

The author of those words was the Secretary of State for Social Services. My clause, is, therefore, his policy, the policy of the Mental Health Act Commission and everyone's policy, so why not put it on the statute book? I hope that the Minister for Health will accept what we are trying to achieve.

Government new clause 6 merely requires notification by hospitals to the social services as proposed in their consultation paper. The AMA says:

"Notifying social services departments . . . is on its own a waste of paper."

Both the AMA and the ACC would prefer the assessment to be instigated by the hospital, and that is reflected in new clause 11. I have tried to respond constructively to the suggestions of those who will have to implement the Bill.

The AMA said:

"Notifying social services departments of impending or actual hospital discharges is, on its own, a waste of paper . . . We cannot see the Government's proposals as anything other than a token gesture which in some cases will do more harm than good. It would be unfortunate if routine notifications took the place of considered assessments and real attempts to arrange suitable facilities before discharge. The Government should be under no illusions that by its present proposal it is killing off an important aspect of the original Bill."

The Royal College of Psychiatrists wrote to me saying:

"Psychiatrists will applaud your efforts to obtain adequate community facilities for patients discharged from hospitals and we would wish to support you in this."

New clause 11 follows Government new clause 6 practically verbatim, except that it substitutes "assessing" for "notification". If the hospital is to take the lead responsibility for the assessment in conjunction with the social services, no separate formal notification is required. Because of the Government restrictions elsewhere in the Bill, I have limited the scope of assessments to the "welfare enactments", although other matters, such as housing, will clearly be of prime importance. Because of the general welcome of the principle, I have no doubt that hospitals will seek to broaden the scope of the assessment as appropriate in each case. In this as in other matters we have tried, reluctantly, to accommodate the Government's views.

Mr. Dafydd Wigley (Caernarfon): Will the hon. Gentleman confirm that, in bringing forward the new clause, he has answered most of the criticisms of those worried by bureaucracy and has retained the core of the argument about assessment? This is a good compromise on which we can all build for the future.

Mr. Clarke: We have tried to do that while conceding the vital principle of arranging for proper assessment before hospital discharge.

I have dropped the 28-day requirement of the original Bill in a further attempt to meet the Government's concerns. I have accepted, with great regret and reluctance, the exclusion of people who have totalled six months' treatment in a year but whose period in hospital has not been continuous. To me, it seems axiomatic that those caught in the revolving door syndrome need the best possible assessment because the support they have had has obviously proved inadequate. If the House accepts the clause, I hope that the Department will suggest to authorities that they can extend the procedures required by the Bill to other patients at their discretion. I am sure that they would wish to do so. There is no substitute for good example, and best practice has its own appeal.

Of course, the authorities are concerned about costs —not so much the cost of assessments, which I think will be on average only one or two a week for each health authority, but the cost of providing community care for mentally ill people where practically nothing exists at present. Ministers have been proclaiming the priority of mental illness for more than 10 years and much of the specific funding from the Department has gone to this sector.

I must admit that, from the publicity Ministers have obtained, I thought that the sums involved were significantly greater than those revealed in a reply to me last Wednesday when the Minister said that the group which causes most concern, the adult mentally ill, had received only £5 million, with another £6 million in the pipeline. Even so, it is difficult to know whether the Department has obtained value for money, and one reason is that authorities are operating in a legislative vacuum. The Mental Health Act 1983 failed to pay more than lip service to the key liaison between authorities over discharge.

10.30 am

On Second Reading I said that the Bill would need to be phased, in consultation with the authorities. The Minister has said that he will not bring parts of the Bill into effect without the necessary resources. I shall refer to that matter generally on Third Reading. Again I am trying hard to accommodate the Minister's position. Where we may differ is in our estimates of the cost and the priority which should be given to disabled people, not in relation to other recipients of the health and social services but other areas of Government expenditure.

On new clause 11, I am fully prepared for implementation to be delayed slightly longer than other clauses in the Bill in order to allow adequate preparation. Of course there is nothing to stop authorities setting up the procedures in advance of a firm target date which I hope will be not later than the financial year 1988-89. However, I think it is right to allow sufficient time for plans for the necessary services to be developed in those areas where the mentally ill are offered next to nothing at present.

This would allow for two full cycles of rate support grant settlement negotiations as well as allocation from joint finance, and so on. I must repeat, however, that I expect the clause to save money in the medium term by significantly reducing hospital readmissions and enabling many ex-patients to achieve eventually stable lives in the community with a minimum of statutory support. The social impact of thi change would be immeasurable and immensely worth while. For that reason, we who support the Bill see it as one of our leading priorities and we hope that the Minister for Health will respond in that light.

Mr. Roy Galley (Halifax): New clause 14 goes a little further in some ways than new clause 11. However, it covers substantially the same ground and it is motivated by the basic conviction that by itself notification will be insufficient in the circumstances which face us. The new clause proposes that individual care plans should be implemented for all the mentally ill and mentally handicapped people who are discharged from hospitals into the community. This was a key recommendation of the Social Services Committee's report on community care. A considerable amount of evidence was given to the Committee—both formal evidence and during visits that were made throughout the country and abroad—to the effect that detailed thought must be given to the arrangements that are made for patients when they are discharged from hospital. The Committee said that the evidence:

"highlights that sometimes dismal lack of co-operation between the many professions involved in care and treatment of mentally ill people. Evidence was also received of instances where the families of the patients were never informed of their relative's discharge. Insufficient effort would seem to be devoted on occasions to tracking a discharged patient. What is needed is a positive determination to improve the practice on discharges. Parliament laid down, in section 117 of the Mental Health Act 1983, a duty of after-care for detained patients. There is no reason now why a similar regime should not apply to all mental patients, whether statutory or not."

That is the kernel of the argument in new clause 14. The success of community care for the mentally ill and the mentally handicapped and the development of new and enlightened policies is vital for us all. There is enormous evidence that the very principle would have a curative effect on many individuals. Therefore, it is important that it should work.

New clause 11 and new clause 14 seek to help the Government to ensure that the community care policy works. It will work only if adequate arrangements are made for those who are discharged from our large institutions. There should be a wide range of opportunities that are geared to the particular needs of each person on discharge. A small, institutionalised form of asylum may be needed, or hospitals, or houses with varying levels of staff support, or a return to the family, or a number of other possibilities.

The clause seeks to provide individual arrangements for those who are discharged, including medical treatment and, where appropriate, day care facilities and accommodation. The clause puts the onus on the responsible medical officer. He is responsible for the oversight of a patient's treatment while he is in hospital. He seems, therefore, to be the right person to have that co-ordinating responsibility.

The new clause says:—

"No disabled person shall be discharged from hospital until a care plan has been adopted."

The medical officer would have a duty to liaise with other parts of the health authority and also with the local authority, the relevant voluntary organisation and so on.

New clause 14 would not result in significant open-ended cost implications. The clause provides that people would stay in hospital until appropriate community facilities were available. It tries to deal with the revolving door problem—with those whom the hon. Member for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke) called "yo-yo" patients. There is no care strategy for them. They may not be long-term inpatients; they keep going into and coming out of hospital. Care planning needs to take that group of people into account.

The wording of the new clause may not be entirely ideal, but when making arrangements for discharge it is necessary that this group should be included. Therefore I urge my right hon. Friend to accept either new clause 11 or new clause 14. It is vital that our community care policies for the mentally ill and the mentally handicapped should work. If they fail, public confidence may be lost and that would lead to pressure to put the policy into reverse. That would not be in the interests of the Government or of the mentally ill and the mentally handicapped. By accepting one or other of these amendments the Government will, I hope, help to buttress a successful policy.

Mr. Lewis Carter-Jones (Eccles): I agree substantially with what the hon. Member for Halifax (Mr. Galley) has just said. New clause 11 contains the words

"not less than 6 months."

That is merely a guideline. Discharge from long-term hospitals is usually after a much longer period than that. It would be a form of refined cruelty if people who had been in hospital for long periods were to be discharged without their needs having been assessed. This goes to the nub of the matter.

I am certain that the Minister will accept this new clause. It is a wise move. If we are to pursue the policy of bringing these people back into the community, it is, as I said earlier, a form of refined cruelty not to make an assessment of their needs and to provide for those needs. Therefore, I ask both Ministers to accept either new clause 11 or new clause 14. That would make a success of the concept of bringing these people back into the community where they rightly belong.

Mr. Andrew Rowe (Mid-Kent): I understand why my right hon. Friend should be anxious about the resource implications of what is required. The provisions that have already been made are severely inadequate. However, this is a further example of the tangled web that my right hon. Friend has inherited, for which he is not responsible. He is faced with the difficulty of one pocket of public expenditure suddenly being expected to acept a cost that hitherto has been borne by another pocket of public expenditure. We have to look closely at the extension of joint funding arrangements to enable one element of the caring services to accept a cost which is being saved by another element of the caring services.

Many of the cost implications tend to be exaggerated because, in the past, we have not been sufficiently imaginative to consider alternative ways of handling some of these problems. Many mentally ill patients require, as much as anything, the maintenance of a regular contact with a caring person. Such a person does not need to be highly skilled. The administration of such a service through the local authorities is enormously expensive, no matter how careful the local authority may be in its spending. The administrative costs and the costs of running headquarters are high.

The Community Service Volunteers has helped to sponsor the creation, in Sunderland, of a home help co-operative. It is an imaginative scheme, which should be used on a wider scale. A group of women have set themselves up as a co-operative to provide home help care. They are paid local authority rates but, as they have no overheads, the service costs considerably less than if it were provided directly through the local authority. I believe that there is scope for providing such imaginative support ad I hope that it will be extended. I am aware that the scheme has the support of my right hon. Friend's Department as well as other Government Departments.

It is an imaginative scheme and, if adopted, the cost of providing care in the community, which many patients need to prevent them from going back through the revolving door, could be cut to a point where the anxieties of my right hon. Friend could be minimised.

Mr. Charles Kennedy (Ross, Cromarty and Skye): I add my name to the long list of people in the House and in the country who have paid tribute to the hon. Member for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke). He has presented the Bill with characteristic style and detail. On behalf of my colleagues, I support the points which have already been made on new clause 11.

There has been a great deal of public comment—the Minister has also commented on it—on the anxiety concerning resources. It is critical to remember that this new clause concerns assessment and the potential for net savings on existing hospital facilities from a proper assessment of what could and should be made available in the community for patients when they have been discharged.

The new clause should be considered in the context of saving health authority and local authority expenditure in the long term. The demands of patients must be adequately met and there must be proper planning. The hon. Member for Monklands, West sketched out the feasibility of a possible two-year time scale, and that is a sensible plan.

It is important to stress to the Minister that we are all aware that too often community care has been based on the revolving door syndrome. Too often state provision has been inadequate and back-up facilities have not existed in the community. There are genuine difficulties in the community. There is a cycle of hospital admission, discharge and readmission. Anything which helps to overcome that appalling and distressing cycle is surely to be warmly supported. I hope that the Minister will give his warm support to the new clause.

Mr. Patrick Thompson (Norwich, North): I am grateful for the opportunity to speak in support of new clause 14 which has been explained adequately by my hon. Friend the Member for Halfax (Mr. Galley). I am encouraged by the present atmosphere of general support in the House for the Bill, suitably amended, reaching the statute book. It is a credit to the House and the way in which we approach such a subject.

Recently there was an excellent series of articles in The Times by Marjorie Wallace describing the problems which affect many families whose children become mentally ill. When my hon. Friend the Member for Halifax presented new clause 14 he was considering such cases. Youngsters in a family may be fine and fit for many years but, in their teens, or perhaps later, when they go to university, there is a sudden onset of mental illness which may result in the young person going to hospital. What happens then?

All to often—this process has been described in many articles and papers, so I will not go into detail—these young people are discharged from hospital and are returned to their families. There are often appalling, distressing scenes and the young person may leave the family and become a vagrant. He may return to hospital and be discharged again. The community care, which we all support, does not materialise.

10.45 am

A young person with this type of disability does not know what he wants. He may want to be discharged from hospital but it may not be the right time. For this reason, new clause 14 is pertinent to the problem. There is a great deal of hidden distress in Britain because of that problem.

I strongly emphasise the need for the Government and my right hon. Friend to consider seriously what has been said on new clause 11 and especially new clause 14. I hope that my hon. Friends and Opposition Members will do all that they can to support the principle behind the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Halifax. We must support principles which are designed to help people, especially young people, in distress.

Mr. Ashley: I commend new clause 11 and the way in which my hon. Friend the Member for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke) presented it. He did so in the constructive spirit which has animated the debate. I hope that the Minister will feel able to respond to that.

I do not know whether the Minister or other hon. Members have been in hospital. I have a few times and, after a couple of weeks, I have felt disorientated. Of the 15,000 mentally handicapped people who leave hospital, more than 10,000 have been in hospital for two years. One cannot expect them to leave hospital without being in distress; to help them they must be given assessment and resources.

I take issue with my hon. Friend the Member for Eccles (Mr. Carter-Jones). To impose such bad conditions on those people is not refined cruelty but unrefined cruelty. If the clause is accepted—I am sure the Minister will find it constructive—it will help people who ought to be receiving help under existing legislation.

[Mr. Ashley]

If the Minister can accept the clause, it will be appreciated, and will save him money. It costs £12,000 to keep a person in hospital. The Minister, by accepting the clause, would help the House, himself and the Chancellor of the Exchequer. No one can be more constructive than that.

Mr. Michael Stern (Bristol, North-West): I should like to add my name to the long list of the those who have congratulated the hon. Member for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke) on introducing a Bill which will undoubtedly mark significant progress in treatment of and care for, especially, the mentally handicapped. I am most grateful to him for that.

Like many of my colleagues, I accept the need for provision for the assessment of patients who leave hospital after a long stay. It is essential that we go further than the hon. Member for Monklands, West has proposed. May I offer the hon. Gentleman a small warning not to be too prescriptive about the method of assessment? I know from constituency experience that the health authority must often take the lead when providing assessment. That function is usually performed by the authority in which the patient is to live, but it would often be more appropriate if the sending authority did the assessment.

I represent part of the county of Avon — if one accepts that the county of Avon exists—which has for years accepted patients from many parts of the country. It is not known until shortly before they are discharged whether patients still have family connections in those parts of the country from which they came.

As patients leave hospital — there has been a substantial drop in the number of patients in one hospital in my constituency during the past year — the local authority finds itself dealing with not one or five local authorities but nearer 50. That puts a tremendous burden on the health authority in ensuring that patients are provided for unless those other authorities give substantial help. Even then, there is an enormous burden on hospital administration.

A couple who have recently been discharged from a mental hospital are attempting to negotiate with a health authority in the south of England for their brother to stay with them permanently. The difficulties have fallen almost entirely on the local authority because of the distances involved. It has been unable to do much planning of the care that the discharged patient will receive.

I am anxious that we should not, by making prescriptions in the Bill, debar the appropriate method or organisation of assessment from being pursued in what will inevitably be a large number of individual cases with peculiar requirements. I hope that my right hon. Friend the Minister can say to what extent the many forms of assessment currently practised can be encouraged in the Bill.

Mr. Martin Flannery (Sheffield, Hillsborough): I should like to add my voice to those who have supported my hon. Friend the Member for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke), whose restrained marshalling of arguments is such a valuable contribution.

I have a major mental hospital in my constituency and I have had contacts with it, although not as many as I would have hoped. I was a head teacher in the area, and it is amazing how one knows what is going on in families when there is mental illness. If families try to look after a sick person and do not receive support, that person will have to go back to hospital depressed and ill once again. It is morally indefensible to let people out of hospital without proper assessment and support. As the hon. Member for Ross, Cromarty and Skye (Mr. Kennedy) said, the melancholy process of coming out of hospital and going back in must be more costly.

My hon. Friend has raised such a fundamental issue that the Bill must go through, especially in view of the large number of the ill and compassionate people who are watching the events in the House today.

Mrs. Edwina Currie (Derbyshire, South): I too would like to speak briefly on this group of new clauses and the amendment concerning hospital discharge, which has been a matter of considerable concern to many of us, especially those of us who have been involved with administering services in major cities, which have tended to attract people who have been discharged, whether voluntarily or against their will.

I am sorry that I have not been able to take part in debates on the Bill or in the Committee but, like several hon. Members present, those of us who take an interest have been removed from public life, as it were, to serve on the Social Security Bill. I look forward to seeing an end to that as well.

I welcome the thrust of the Bill and greatly hope to see it on the statute book, preferably as soon as possible, but those who are a little cautious have genuine reasons for our concern. Neither the hon. Member for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke) nor anyone else should imply that we do not care. It is all too easy to write tough legislation, put it on the statute book and then wonder why it is unworkable. It is all too easy to create statutory obligations for local authorities without a thought to the resources that they have to find, and then puzzle about the long list of statutory obligations that local authorities do not carry out. Good will just is not enough.

I am one of those who had to administer previous legislation which had those glaring faults. I think especially of the Chronically Sick and Disabled Persons Act 1970. To make it all work these cautions should be taken into account. A step-by-step approach is more likely to achieve the desired objectives.

I should like to put on record my unconditional admiration of all concerned, especially with regard to the efforts that they have made behind the scenes and in Committee to come to some agreement. I hope from the bottom of my heart that we can achieve our objective today without dividing the House and that we can reach a unanimous view on what we are trying to do. How nice that would be.

New clause 6 is a great practical improvement on the original clause 4. The hon. Member for Monklands, West has said which of the restrictive elements in that clause he has been willing to remove. The 28 days element would have made life just about impossible for everyone in local authorities who tried to administer it.

The Bill that emerged from Committee emphasised social services departments, and so did the hon. Member for Monklands, West when he introduced this debate. It is important that housing should be included because the first thing that a person needs on discharge from hospital is somewhere to live. In that respect, new clauses 11 and 6 are major improvements, because they speak of the local authority rather than just of the local authority social services department. There are local authority departments for whom disabled people may be a much lower priority, who ought to be involved. I am glad that the new clauses make that point.

The hon. Gentleman also said that notifying the social services department is a waste of paper. I understand that he was quoting some of the representations that have been made on the Bill. Surely that is not so. For many of the years in the 1970s we in Birmingham were bedevilled by people on the streets. They had been discharged from hospitals all over the country, especially Scotland, given a train ticket to Birmingham and, in one or two cases, the address of a lodging house, and sent on their way. The local authority, which wanted to assist, was bedevilled by not knowing how many people there were in that position or where they came from.

Mr. Tom Clarke: The organisation which took the view that it was a waste of paper was saying, in effect, that notification was exclusively a waste of paper and was not meaningful in the absense of full assessment, which is what the new clause seeks to achieve.

Mrs. Currie: I take that point. I would merely say that we do not have any notification at present. Local authorities which have good will, and which in many cases could find the resources to assist, find it extremely difficult to undertake any sort of planning when they do not know with whom they may be dealing. In the cases to which I have referred, people were literally picked out of dustbins. We had no idea from where they came and we were in ignorance of their background. Frequently, they were incapable of giving us that information. That made it extremely difficult to make any sort of arrangements for them. There was no liaison. My judgment at that time was that the health authorities and the hospitals concerned were willing to avoid liaison. They felt that they had done their duty and were content to send people on their way. That was wrong.

I shall direct a few remarks to my hon. Friend the Member for Halifax (Mr. Galley) and comment on the excellent way in which he introduced new clause 14. My hon. Friend said that notification is not enough, and that is right. However, as long as we do not have notification, we should welcome moves in that direction. I suspect that if my right hon. Friend the Minister for Health had introduced a small Bill containing all the clauses that he is keen to support this morning, we would all have welcomed it as an example of some progress being made in helping the disabled.

I am worried about new clause 14—my hon. Friend the Member for Halifax knows that I have the greatest sympathy for it, having served with him on the Select Committee on Social Services—because of the power that is proposed within it and the command that is given over resources. I suspect that we shall end up by taking power out of the hands of elected representatives, where it should remain.

As the clause stands, an enormous amount of effort could be put into writing perfection into all care plans and producing exactly what would be required for every year of discharge of a disabled person's lifetime, only to find that resources are not available to do what is required. Alternatively, the committees involved might direct priorities elsewhere. When I had responsibilities for these matters in Birmingham, I can remember being asked on one occasion whether I would be prepared to release resources for much favoured plans to help redevelop the centre of the city to save it from dereliction. I took the view that those plans were rather more important than other considerations. We hoped to maintain the rate basis of the city and so produce resources in future to assist the disabled and everyone else we wanted to help. If we write perfection into all care plans, they may end up on the shelf, in common with much other planning. The law would be complied with, but that would not be good enough. That would not be sufficient.

When a local authority knows that a person is coming out of hospital, the planning process should start. We should write into law the liaison that should take place between the authorities concerned. That is the bedrock of getting any decent discharge plan going. That is the sine quo non. Unfortunately, that is not set out in the law. The Bill, with wise amendments, will give considerable assistance to the disabled and I hope that we shall see it make progress today.

Mr. Alfred Morris: I rise to endorse new clause 11 from the Opposition Front Bench. I am pleased to do so because it is an important new clause which merits the support of right hon. and hon. Members on both sides of the House.

Ministers in successive Governments have for years pressed for joint planning and joint assessment of residents who are being considered for planned discharge from hospital. That being so, and in the light of the successful use of joint funding and other resource allocation changes to facilitate such collaboration, it is surely untenable to object to procedures which require hospitals to give reasonable notice to the local authority—so that timely and proper assessment can take place — when they propose to discharge a patient.

I have known many cases where people have had to be swiftly readmitted to hospital because there was no knowledge by the local authority of their discharge from hospital. That can be costly as well as inhumane. My hon. Friend the Member for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke) was eminently right to say that there could be savings in the medium term. There will be cost implications in the short term entirely due to the poor level of services for the mentally ill at present. In many authorities the level of services, as I am sure the Minister for Health will agree, is regrettably very low indeed.

There is an important gap that the clause seeks to fill and it deserves the support of both sides of the House. I hope that we shall not have to divide to ensure that the clause is added to the Bill.

Mr. Hayhoe: We have had a useful short debate in which many helpful suggestions have been made, some of which have gone rather wider than the legislative detail that is before us. Perhaps it would not be appropriate for me to respond to many of these suggestions, and I am not sure that I would be able to do so without considerably more research. I can assure those who have contributed to the debate that their contributions will be considered carefully, including their suggestions that certain ideas should be more widely adopted.

I welcome the general support that has emerged from this short debate for the broad thrust of the community care concept of moving people, wherever appropriate, out of institutional care into the more dignified, the more human and the more——

Mr. Laurie Pavitt (Brent, South): Therapeutic?

Mr. Hayhoe: Yes—therapeutic atmosphere. That is the word that I was after. It is a move that improves their own physical standards. One sees remarkable improvements in people as a result of moving them from institutions into the community. That is in no way to criticise those who contribute to the running of our large institutions. I would not wish to do other than pay tribute to them. I do not believe that in commending community care we are seeking to deny the great dedication that comes from the majority of those who work in the institutions.

Mr. Pavitt: Give 'em the money, Barney.

Mr. Hayhoe: I think that it will be useful for the record to make it clear that clause 4 as it stands would place a duty on hospital managers to inform the relevant social services department of the date of discharge—at least 28 days in advance—of any person who had received treatment for mental disorder as an inpatient for periods totalling six months or more in the preceding 12 months period. Notification would be subject to the patient's consent. Social services departments, on receipt of this information, would undertake an assessment of that person's needs within 28 days.

These provisions arouse concern within the Government although the intention behind the clause was very much in line with their general philosophy of community care, which the Government have been promoting in various ways. It seeks to enshrine in legislation what is already accepted good practice. But it would introduce procedures that are unnecessarily prescriptive and would cause problems in practice. It would place the responsibility for assessment of patients about to be discharged from psychiatric hospitals in all cases on social services departments. It is right that social services should contribute to assessments, but hospital authorities with current responsibility for the patient should normally be in the lead. There would be great difficulties if the hospital authorities were not very much involved.

A minimum period of 28 days for notifying social services of a patient's discharge would, as my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie) said, impose unacceptable administrative constraint on both health and local authorities. The formula for adding up periods of short-term care in hospital would cause problems. It is not uncommon for people with mental disorder to spend frequent short spells as inpatients. The notification process could be triggered off unnecessarily at frequent intervals.

The Government's new clause 6 would require hospital managers, unless the patient objects, to inform the appropriate local authority—social services department, or, in the case of people under 19, local authority—of the expected date of discharge of an inpatient who had been receiving treatment for a mental disorder for a continuous period of at least six months, as soon as it is reasonably practicable to do so. It would require hospital managers, in the case of a mental health review tribunal directing the immediate discharge of such a patient, to inform the local authority that discharge had taken place, provided the patient does not object.

There are two alternatives to the Government's new clause 6. I shall briefly deal with new clause 14 proposed by my hon. Friend the Member for Halifax (Mr. Galley). The new clause would require the responsible medical officer to prepare a care plan before discharge for any person who had "received medical treatment for mental disorder as an in-patient for a period, of or periods totalling not less than, six months in the preceding twelve months or on a regular basis over two years."

The care plan would have to be prepared in consultation with other health authority officers, the local family practitioner committee, the local authority and relevant voluntary organisations. No disabled person could be discharged from hospital until a care plan had been adopted. The new clause further provides for a statement of the care plan to be provided to the disabled person or his authorised representative and for representations about the content of the care plan to be made to the responsible medical officer.

It is not clear from the clause as drafted precisely what is meant by a care plan, although I took note of the comments made by my hon. Friend the Member for Halifax and the support given to him by my hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, North (Mr. Thompson). Presumably, as I understand it, it would be a detailed programme tailor-made to the individual person and designed with particular treatment objectives in mind. However, the production of a plan is only the first step, as all of us realise. As a plan, it means very little. The treatments or activities have to be delivered, the results monitored and the plan updated to take account of the success or failure and the need to set new goals. The whole process is resource-intensive. Even at the level which may be envisaged by my hon. Friend the Member for Halifax of producing a statement of the main elements of care which will be provided in the community, it has to be said that people's needs change and are particularly likely to change after discharge from hospital into a new environment. Those were the very points made by the right hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, South (Mr. Ashley). A detailed plan produced before discharge could be of short-lived validity. It could also introduce inflexibility whereas the authorities responsible for the care of the mentally disordered person after discharge should be sensitive to changes in the person's needs and react accordingly. The machinery envisaged is rather bureaucratic.

The provision that no disabled person shall be discharged from hospital until a care plan has been adopted would conflict with the right of voluntary patients to discharge themselves whenever they like, and with the implementation of a decision of a mental health review tribunal to order an immediate discharge. Therefore, there are technical problems and other difficulties associated with the clause as drafted and suggested by my hon. Friend.

11.15 am

In his comments my hon. Friend the Member for Halifax made it clear that if he could not have new clause 14 he would like new clause 11 rather than the Government's new clause 6. Therefore, I shall deal with new clause 11 which has been proposed by the promoter of the Bill. It follows the basic structure of the Government's proposed new clause 6. I am grateful to the hon. Member for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke) for building upon that. It would certainly avoid some of the objectionable features of clause 4, which I have pointed out to the House. In particular, the 28-day minimum period for notification disappears as does the formula for adding up periods of short term care in hospital. New clause 11 would place a duty upon hospital managers, when someone is being discharged from hospital after having received continuous treatment as an inpatient for a continuous period of at least six months, to make arrangements with the relevant local authority for an assessment of the patient's needs. The assessment would have to be made before the date of discharge except in the case of patients who are discharged immediately by a mental health review tribunal, in which case the arrangements would have to be made as soon as is practicable.

There are some difficulties with this clause. I would be less than frank with the House if I did not acknowledge that. It fails to make clear what the extent and the duty would be of hospital managers when a local authority failed to participate in the arrangements for an assessment. What will happen if the local authorities social services department is unco-operative? That is not clear in the present formulation. Clearly, hospital authorities have no power to direct local authorities to participate in the assessment of needs.

Similarly, the clause fails to make clear what responsibility, if any, would fall on a local education authority in respect of persons under 19 years of age as they have no responsibility for welfare enactments within the terms of the Bill. I am advised that, in any event, those under 19 years of age in hospital would have already been the subject of a statement of special education needs as provided for under the new clauses we have just discussed and new clause 12, which we have accepted. In other words, there is a technical problem. By requiring hospital managers to make arrangements for an assessment it would give them a wider responsibility than would be placed on them under the Government's new clause 6. That is the thrust of what the hon. Member for Monklands, West is doing in commending his new clause to the House.

I am very sympathetic and I want to respond positively and constructively to what the hon. Gentleman and both sides of the House have put to me. I believe that there will need to be some further discussion with the local authorities, and especially with the health authorities because there is a new provision for them. Therefore, in the time available it has not been possible to have the proper level of consultation required.

It has been acknowledged that there are resource implications for this. I have noted the, I hope not optimistic, comments about the initial savings which are available, if not in the short term, at least in the medium and long term. I suppose, having once been a Treasury Minister, one has a certain training to recognise that jam tomorrow is something which never quite seems to come, whereas costs today are very much always on one's desk. I do not want to be unduly controversial on this matter. I have made the Government's position on resources absolutely clear. If this leads to a reduction of duplication, of course, it is something which all of us welcome because, whatever our arguments across the Floor of the House on the amount of resources that ought to be and can be made available, we will all agree that the resources which are available should be used effectively and efficiently to help the individuals concerned. Therefore, I certainly do not oppose the adoption of the new clause proposed by the promoter of the Bill. In those circumstances, I would not propose to move new clause 6.

New Clause 1

AMENDMENT OF SECTION 29(2) OF THE CHRONICALLY SICK AND DISABLED PERSONS ACT 1970

'(1) In section 29 of the Chronically Sick and Disabled Persons Act 1970 in subsection (2) (which extends the Act to Scotland) for paragraph (a) there shall be substituted the following paragraph—

"(a) any references to functions under section 29 of the National Assistance Act 1948 shall be construed as references to duties to—

(i) chronically sick or disabled persons;

(ii) persons suffering from mental disorder,

(being persons in need) under section 12 of the Social Work (Scotland) Act 1968;".

(2) Subsection (1) above extends to Scotland only.'.—Mr. John MacKay.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. John MacKay: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

New clause 1 clarifies the position of mentally disordered persons in Scotland in relation to local authority duties under sections 1 and 2 (1) of the Chronically Sick and Disabled Persons Act 1970.

My inquiries into the working of the present chronically sick and disabled persons legislation in Scotland suggested that local authorities did not all regard the duty to provide services in cases of evident need as applying equally to the mentally disordered and those suffering from physical or sensory disability. I thought it appropriate to use the present legislative opportunity to clarify the position. Therefore, in Committee I offered to seek, in the consultations that we had decided to undertake, the views of local authority and other interests on whether the term "disabled persons" in the Scottish application of the present Chronically Sick and Disabled Persons Act should be defined to include mental disability. That was welcomed by the Bill's sponsors and the Committee in general.

The views expressed on that proposal were generally supportive. The Convention of Scottish Local Authorities felt that clarification was desirable for the avoidance of doubt, although, I am happy to record, it felt that any such doubt was likely to be comparatively uncommon. That favourable view was echoed by other bodies, mainly those representing persons suffering from mental disorder.

The provision that I have tabled accordingly takes the form of a replacement for the provision of section 1(1) of the Chronically Sick and Disabled Persons (Scotland) Act 1972, which originally applied sections 1 and 2 of the 1970 Act to Scotland, but did not make specific reference to persons suffering from mental disorder. To that extent, in future the law in Scotland will be the same as that already applying in England and Wales, where it is clear from th terms of section 29 of the National Assistance Act 1948 as amended that local authority duties under that provision and hence under the Chronically Sick and Disabled Persons Acts extend to persons suffering from mental disorder.

I hope that with that explanation of what the new clause does, it will be acceptable to the House and the hon. Member for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke), who I am sure is as keen as I am that the provisions should be clearly understood in Scotland by the local authorities as applying to people with mental disorders.

Mr. Tom Clarke: I should make it clear that my position has not changed at all on this matter. I recognise that the new clause is a technical correction. I am sure that the Minister will accept that description. I would not wish to oppose it. For the convenience of the House, I suggest that we accept the hon. Gentleman's proposals.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause read a Second time, and added to the Bill.

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Hayhoe: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take amendment No. 9.

Mr. Hayhoe: New clause 4 is a purely technical clarification. This is the interpretation clause. It has been necessary to make those changes. I hope that there will be no difficulty in the House accepting new clause 4.

Amendment No. 9 deletes clause 9. Again, that is a purely technical deletion, as part of the intentions for applying part I of the Bill to Scotland by way of the appropriate references to Scotland in each clause as necessary. In Committee, an undertaking was given that the substantive provisions of the Bill as finally amended would be fully applied to Scotland. That has been done in so far as one has been able to do so, but some further changes will probably be necessary in the other place, as has been said by my hon. Friend the Parliamentary under-Secretary of State for Scotland, as a result of the new clauses that we are adopting today. Otherwise, we have sought to achieve what was undertaken in Committee. Action will be needed in another place. Clause 9 as it stands is redundant. I hope that, at the appropriate time, the House will agree to its deletion.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause read a Second time, and added to the Bill.

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Hayhoe: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

'(bb) information with respect to the numbers of persons under treatment for mental illness or disorder and mental handicap discharged from hospital and the arrangements for the care of those persons outside hospital in each case analysed by reference to age, length of stay and diagnostic classes; and'.

Amendment No. 12.

Mr. Hayhoe: Clause 12 as drafted would require the Secretary of State to identify and report to Parliament annually on the number and ages of children resident in mental handicap hospitals for a period totalling at least six months in the preceding year; on similar details for adults in mental handicap or psychiatric hospitals; and on the numbers in each category who have moved out of each hospital since the previous report and the provision that has been made for them in the community.

The Government have proposed the change not because they had any objection to the intentions behind clause 12, but, having looked at the matter carefully, they found that it is not possible to give information about the numbers of individual patients dischared or provision made in the community specifically for them. Information could be provided in a more relevant and helpful form to that required in clause 12 because as clause 12 stands information would include those who had been in-patients for frequent short-stay periods, which would mask the number of long-stay patients.

Therefore, new clause 5 would require the Secretary of State to make an annual report to Parliament giving information on the development of health and social services in the community for mentally ill and mentally handicapped people, as he considers appropriate; a breakdown of the numbers, by age and length of stay, of patients in National Health Service, mental handicap and mental illness hospitals; and such other information, if any, as he considers appropriate. It would enable the commitment that I gave in Committee to provide information on small units with four beds or under to be met. With the change in the arrangements for dealing with mental handicap and mental illness, it is proper that that should be included.

Therefore, I commend new clause 5 to the House and hope that, at the appropriate time, hon. Members will agree to the deletion of clause 12.

Mr. Galley: My amendment (b) to new clause 5 reinserts in the Bill provisions relating to information on discharge from hospital. I note carefully what my right hon. Friend the Minister said about the difficulties of obtaining that information, and that that is why the Government have sought to amend the Bill. However, I believe that it is extraordinarily important that, if we are to have meaningful information in the report to Parliament, we know what happens to people on discharge.

The new clause specifies information about the number of people in hospital, but says nothing about the arrangements for people being discharged. If we know how many are in hospital and how many are being treated, I cannot see the difficulty in providing at least some information on what happens to people on discharge. We need to know about the numbers discharged and the arrangements made for them, otherwise how are we to monitor the progress, success and problems of our community care policies?

Although amendment (b) does not specify this too closely—that is deliberately so, because I do not wish to tie down the Secretary of State too much—I hope that reports giving the numbers of those discharged, and how many of them may have moved back to their families or into hostel type accommodation or unstaffed homes with some community support will be published. That would allow us to build up a data bank to determine the success of the policy and also of good practice in ensuring that community care ideas come to fruition.

11.30 am

Mr. Greg Knight (Derby, North): Does my hon. Friend intend that the information given will relate to those persons discharged from hospital in the year for which the Minister gives his report, or will it be given about those discharged from hospital but who are still receiving treatment?

Mr. Galley: That would be consistent with the new clause. My interpretation of my amendment is that such information would be on the same lines as other statistics produced annually in the NHS in that it would be about the numbers discharged during the course of the 12 months to which the NHS annual report refers, and about what has happened to those people. We need some information about trends of people discharged, their community locations and treatment. If we are to plan sensible services, that is as important, if not more important, as how many people are in hospital on an in-patient basis.

Amendments (a) and (b) refer not only to age and length of stay but to diagnostic classes. It is important that we know how many people are in hospital or being discharged under certain diagnostic headings. We need to know how many of them have long-term serious mental illness, and how many have short-term, rather less serious mental illness. That is the key to planning sensibly the required services.

There should not be any great difficulty of acquiring such information. Figures on admissions to hospital by diagnostic classes are already available in the annual NHS statistics, and it would be fairly easy for a requirement for such information to be included in the new clause. One can understand the difficulties to which my hon. Friend the Minister refers. I hope that he understands the worry of many in the House and elsewhere about not having full, accurate, up-to-date and sensible data. One cannot plan appropriate services for those discharged without such information, and I hope that my hon. Friend will indertake to give rather more sympathetic consideration to these small measures.

Mr. Thurnham: My hon. Friend the Minister said that the report would cover the ages and numbers of children. Will it also relate to the local authority which will be responsible for the child on discharge, because sometimes there can be a great deal of confusion? A child may be in hospital for many years, the parents may have moved from the place where the child was when it first came into care, and there may be no contact with any local authorities. One of the reasons why so many children are still in hospital is that no local authority accepts responsibility for them. I have not tabled an amendment, but if my hon. Friend the Minister could make this clear it would be helpful.

Mr. Peter Lilley (St. Albans): I welcome the new clause, especially the requirements for information to be published on the development of health and social services in the community for persons suffering from mental illness or mental handicaps, and for figures of how many people need such provision. I support the publication of such information, because the move towards such provision in the community is being threatened by an unholy alliance that is developing between three groups. One is prejudiced against the mentally ill and mentally handicapped and does not want to see them moved into the community. The second group is seeking to denigrate the Government's achievements in the NHS, and the third group has a vested interest in retaining existing forms of provision—large, old-fashioned institutions.

The unholy alliance that has built up beween these three groups could be overcome if we published more information about what is being done and what needs to be done. I do not deny that many people are genuinely concerned that not enough is being done to make adequate provision in the community, and they too will benefit if more information is published.

Mr. Forth: Does my hon. Friend accept the logic of his position and his points—that the provision of such information in the suggested form may lead to yet further demands for policy developments that could have important resource implications?

Mr. Galley: That is true, but, if new policies are developed on a basis of fact rather than ignorance, we should not stand in their way, and I would welcome such a development.

In Victorian times, the policy towards the mentally ill and handicapped was to get rid of them and put them in large institutions a long way from the centres of population because they were embarrassing and frightening. There are several large institutions around my constituency that were originally far from areas of habitation for precisely that reason.

Nowadays, people are just as prejudiced, but the prejudice takes a more hypocritical and sophisticated form. Frequently, this expresses itself not in terms of, "Let us not have a mentally ill or mentally handicapped person living next door" but, "Is there really adequate provision in the community for these people, should we leave them in institutions, and should we not delay any attempts to close such large institutions and replace them by smaller-scale community care?"

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am trying to be flexible and tolerant, but the hon. Gentleman seems to be getting well away from the new clause that the House is debating.

Mr. Lilley: The new clause emphasises the duty of the Secretary of State to publish information on these matters. The problem that I have outlined, which I see in my constituency, would be eased if such information were published. I hope that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will not just limit himself to publishing information about national statistics, as the clause implies, but that each area health authority will publish similar information to that asked for in the clause.

I support my hon. Friend the Member for Halifax (Mr. Galley) in his amendment (b), which would make clear to the general public the number and type of people in such institutions who will need community care. It would be beneficial if that were spelt out more clearly in the clause. I hope that my hon. Friend's amendment will be accepted.

Widespread ignorance can be overcome only by telling the truth, publishing the facts and letting people know what provision is already being made and how many people need such provision in future. I welcome the new clause and hope that it will be incorporated in the Bill.

Mr. Hayhoe: I shall reply to some of the points raised in the debate. My hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, North-East (Mr. Thurnham) asked what additional information would be incorporated in the reports that would be required as a result of new clause 5. I noted his comments about what would be appropriate, but I hope that he will accept that I cannot give a definitive answer today. Instead of giving a speculative answer, I should be happy to write to him as the matter requires further consideration by the Department in order to see what is appropriate.

Amendment (a) provides that information on the numbers of people receiving treatment for mental illness and mental handicap, as set out in new clause 5(1)(b), would have to be analysed by a diagnostic class as well as by age and length of stay. Amendment (b) requires follow-up information to be obtained on persons discharged from hospital who have received treatment for mental illness, disorder or mental handicap, and for it to be obtained on the arrangements that have been made for their further care. The information published is to be analysed by reference to age, length of stay and diagnostic class.

Information in respect of both of those amendments is not collected. As has been said, it exists in certain places, but the coverage is patchy. The Korner recommendations — the information technology recommendations — are being implemented, but once they have been fully implemented by April 1987 it may well be possible to provide more information on the number of in-patients who have been in hospital for more than 12 months and who are receiving treatment for mental disorder. That information is likely to become available during the summer of 1988.

However, there is no proposal to collect information in the form required in amendment (b), as it would need to be collected from both the Health Service an the local authority's social services department.

Thus, I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Halifax (Mr. Galley) will not press his amendments today, as the information is not available. If it was collected, there would be a significant resource implication for the Department and for the health and local authorities.

Mr. Galley: How difficult and costly would it be to obtain the information? After all, it is important for sensible planning. If the spirit of my new clause 14 which would put the onus on the responsible medical officer was accepted, there would be one collating point, and one would not need two or three different sources.

Mr. Hayhoe: I understand that the Korner information initiative will make it easier to obtain the sort of information that my hon. Friend has in mind through the health authorities. However, the problem of cross-batching with the local authorities would remain. Nevertheless, I give my hon. Friend the assurance that we will try to include in the report to Parliament as much information as possible about long-stay patients receiving treatment for mental disorders, as analysed by diagnostic class. Indeed, I gladly give that assurance.

Once the Korner information becomes available, everything will be put into perspective. If there was a legislative requirement to collect that information and to report to Parliament, as the amendments demand, I would have to take advice on the overall cost. However, I have given the assurance that we shall try to provide such information. The Government's record on providing such information and statistics for the Health Service is pretty good. Indeed, the number of statistics on my desk is very considerable, and the answers that I have given to the Opposition spokesman on health fill up pages of Hansard. I make no complaint about that, as it is wholly proper that such information should be provided. But it shows that I am a willing provider of such information, and so I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Halifax will not press his amendments. We shall do the best we can with regard to reports along the lines that he has implied would be of significance to him and his colleagues.

Question put and agreed to.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Does the hon. Member for Halifax (Mr. Galley) wish to move his amendments formally?

Mr. Galley: In view of the helpful assurances given by my right hon. Friend the Minister, and my wish not to impede progress, I shall not press them.

Clause read a Second time, and added to the Bill.

New Clause 8

and any such regulations may provide for the parent or guardian of a disabled peron under the age of 16 to appoint himself or some other person as the authorised representative of the disabled person, and to terminate any such appointment (but shall not permit a person under that age himself to appoint a person as his authorised representative).

(7) Any such regulations may also make special provision for cases where ther disabled person is unable to appoint, or to terminate the appointment of, an authorised representative by reason of anymental or physical incapacity; and subsection (1) and (2) shall have effect in relation to a person whose authorised representative is appointed by virtue of any such provision as if the words "if so requested by the disabled person" were omitted.

(b) in relation to Scotland, means a regional, islands or district council.'.—[Mr. Hayhoe.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Hayhoe: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss the following: amendment (a) to new clause 8, line 44, at end insert—

'(5A) The person appointed by or on behalf of a disabled person as an authorised representative shall be—

(a) the person exercising the functions set out in subsection (8) below; or

(b) if that is not applicable or where that is not, in the relevant circumstances, reasonable, another person related by blood or marriage to that disabled person; or

(c) where in the relevant circumstances, it would be unreasonable to appoint a person as defined in paragraphs (a) and (b) above, another suitable person who otherwise falls within the terms of this section.'. —[Mr. Roy Galley.]

Amendments Nos. 1, 16 and 17.

11.45 am

Mr. Hayhoe: The new clause involves the representation of disabled people and is obviously an important and significant provision. Clause 1 of the original Bill would enable a disabled person to appoint a representative to attend on his behalf, or accompany him to any meetings of a local authority or health authority at which the provision of services for the disabled person was to be discussed and to provide him with any necessary assistance in connection with the provision of those services or otherwise.

The Government fully recognise that it would be a valuable step forward to provide a right of representation for disabled people. But we are concerned about the practical difficulties of applying the representation provisions to services provided by health authorities as well as social services departments. I certainly recognise the strength of support for such an extension, which emerged from the consultation exercise. Accordingly, the Government are prepared to consider the matter further, in consultation with the health authorities. In Committee, I explained some of the problems that could arise, and we need to discuss further to see how they could be overcome. Consequently, I shall in a moment explain how we propose to deal with the issue.

Mr. Ashley: Before going into the practical difficulties, will the Minister say what practical difficulties arise for the health authorities that do not arise in the area in which he is prepared to accept representation?

Mr. Hayhoe: It might be better for the right hon. Gentleman to wait until I say how I propose to deal with the matter. I hope that he will find that my remarks are not unacceptable to him. As it stands, the clause is of concern to the Government because there are no lower age limits. In the Government's view, it would be undesirable for children under 16 to appoint representatives. However, their parents may find it helpful to do so. Moreover, as it stands, the clause does not make it clear whether a representative would hav only the same rights to attend meetings, or would have access to information that the disabled person would have. There is no provision for a statutory authority to bar a representative from attending a meeting, or from having access to information, if very sensitive personal matters are at issue.

The effect of the Government's amendment, which is to replace clause 1 of the Bill with new clause 8, would be to place a duty on a local authority to allow an authorised representative to act on behalf of a disabled person or accompany him or her to meetings to discuss the provision of social services and to make available to the representative information that the disabled person is entitled to receive. This duty would apply only if the disabled person requested that it should. The local authority could bar the representative from being involved on a particular occasion if the authority thought it would be harmful to the disabled person's interest, although in deciding on that it would have to have regard to any wishes expressed by the disabled person.

Mr. Wigley: Can the Minister clarify what he said about disabled persons giving their consent? How can we solve the problem that a disabled person who is so severely handicapped that he cannot meaningfully consent should not miss out on representation?

Mr. Hayhoe: The hon. Gentleman is pre-empting what I will shortly say. The proposed new clause would also empower the Secretary of State to provide by regulation for appointing representatives by parents appointing themselves or others as representatives for children under 16 and for representatives to be appointed—and I now come to the point the hon. Gentleman the Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) was raising—for those who by reason of mental disorder are themselves unable to appoint representatives. The details of this provision need further consideration.

The hon. Gentleman will remember that we discussed this matter in Committee and, of all the various possibilities, none commanded widespread support. There were difficulties with the various proposals made. Thus, I propose that we go into further consultation on that matter in the hope that additional amendments might, if they were required to deal with the matter, be introduced in another place. I do not believe that on this point there is any difference in principle between me and the hon. Gentleman. We both recognise this as a problem and want to find a solution that is fair and reasonable to all concerned and that works in practice.

Mr. Forth: Could my right hon. Friend also include in such consultation the consideration of any difficulty that might arise as a result of someone with a hearing impairment, who is deaf, and who might need help in interpretation in dealing with the authorities, having access to someone with those skills? Will he consider building into the provisions that will be examined some way of providing assistance to people with the kind of problem to which I have referred?

Mr. Hayhoe: In the context of the Bill, we have certainly been considering the question of interpretation as relevant to dealing with problems of communication arising from disability, not the problems of interpretation arising from different languages in the case of people coming from abroad, and so on. I accept that, in considering these matters, we must take into account the case raised.

The new clause I propose would also provide that representatives should have access at all reasonable times to disabled people whom they represent. The proposal would give the Secretary of State the power to extend, by order, the scope of the representation provisions to the provision of health services and other local authority services. That would mean that consultation could take place. We could see whether we could overcome these difficulties. How will health authorities, in this context, distinguish a disabled person who has an entitlement to a representative from another patient who might well be in the bed alongside, or certainly in the same ward, and who would not have that right? There could be difficulties in that respect.

Would representatives of the disabled person have the right in hospital to be present at clinical examinations? There could be problems there. It will also be recalled that in Committee, when this matter was discussed, reference was made to ethical problems of the medical profession about confidentiality. That matter would need to be taken into account. There is a raft of problems involved, and I hope that in further consultation we can solve them. As I have indicated, the Government have accepted the strength of view expressed during the consultation process in favour of extending the right of representation to health authorities as well as to local authorities.

In the context of this clause I will say something about the implications for resources. The provisions for the appointment of representatives will, as is widely acknowledged, have resource implications. Further, there are the practical difficulties of the health authorities and the need to provide arrangements for the appointment of representatives for those disabled people who are unable to appoint someone themselves—the point I have just been discussing with the hon. Gentleman the Member for Caernarfon. Both of these factors mean that the Government are not able to indicate at this stage when we believe the clause can begin to operate. It would depend on how we are able to overcome the practical difficulties of appointing representatives and on when resources can be made available. I have already made that point in conversation with the hon. Member for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke), but it should be made in the House.

Mr. Clarke: I am slightly concerned about the time factor in this debate. I hope that on Third Reading we shall have the opportunity to deal with the important matter about which the Minister has been speaking.

Mr. Hayhoe: Subject to the decision of the Chair, we can always deal with the point on Third reading. I am sure that for anything else to happen would be out of context with the harmonious attitudes that have pervaded the whole of the discussions on the matter today. I commend new clause 8 and hope that the House will, at the appropriate time, agree to delete clause 1.

Mr. Ashley: It is wrong to exclude health services from representation because, if it is possible to have representation of social services, the same kind of representation should be given in health services. It is significant that major decisions are made for disabled people in health services. If those decisions are thus made, there is little point in giving representation in social services after the damage has been done. I warmly welcome the Minister's assurances that he will enter into consultation; that is a big step forward. I look forward to the consultations and to the fact that the cart-before-the-horse situation I have just mentioned will be considered.

Mr. Galley: I wish to make a few remarks about my amendment (a) to new clause 8. The essence of the amendment is that, wherever possible, there should be a presumption that a disabled person's authorised representative should be a relative by blood or marriage. The drafting of the amendment has caused me some anxiety, but I have had the advantage of the most expert advice available, so I hope that it achieves my objective.

The amendment stems from a concern I expressed on Second Reading that an open-endedness about authorised representatives may allow some disabled people to be manipulated. That concern is shared by the National Schizophrenia Fellowship. We are genuinely worried about the possibility of conflicts of view and interest between the relatives of a disabled person and an authorised repesentative from outside the family. It is important that families are fully involved in the caring process of disabled people.

Mr. Greg Knight: Does my hon. Friend agree that his point cuts both ways, and that there may be a conflict between a disabled person and members of his family?

12 noon

Mr. Galley: My hon. Friend is right, and I shall deal with that point in a moment.

As the new clause stands, relatives and families are deliberately excluded from the representational arrangements and the discussions about care, and I am worried about that. It is presumed that, generally, relatives will be caring and sympathetic, and, indeed, that is normally the case. However, if the problem to which my hon. Friend the Member for Derby, North (Mr. Knight) referred arises, the amendment would introduce a test of reasonableness, relating to the appointment of someone other than the relative by blood or marriage. That test of reasonableness would apply if it were considered that a relative was not sympathetic to a disabled person and would not act in his best interests.

Mr. Forth: Will my hon. Friend clarify the point that I made earlier? If a particular expertise were required, such as lip reading or sign language for the deaf, would the test of reasonableness apply? In other words, if a member of the family could not provide the necessary service, could another representative be appointed to cover that requirement under his amendment?

Mr. Galley: My interpretation of the amendment is that that would be possible. In all these circumstances one hopes that there will be a co-operative element, and that the representative and others with expertise will work together. However, one needs to take particular care in circumstances where there may be disagreements about how care should be delivered.

There is some support for that view in the submission made by the ACC. It states that disabled people are vulnerable, and that it is "not unknown for individuals and organisations to represent such people in an exploitative manner which has little to do with the needs of the disabled as an individual."

I do not wish to over-emphasise that point, but it can occur in certain circumstances. People and organisations who seek to be representatives may have some philosophical or ulterior motive. In most instances where acknowledged experts and established, respected voluntary bodies act as representatives, there will be no difficulty. However, there is a danger of fringe organisations making advocacy almost into a business, without necessarily having the interests of the disabled person at heart. The best way out of the problem is to presume that a relative will do the job, unless it is unreasonable or inappropriate.

In general terms the concept of advocacy is in its infancy. A number of pilot projects are under way, but they have not yet been evaluated. Before we fully implement the provisions on representation we should ensure that a careful evaluation of those advocacy schemes takes place. That is the burden of my case.

There may be difficulties with the amendment as it is drafted. My right hon. Friend the Minister and the hon. Member for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke) may not wish to accept it today, but I hope that my points will receive sympathetic consideration, so that when the regulations relating to the authorisation of representatives are eventually drawn up, the needs, duties and responsibilities of families will be fully taken into account. On that basis, I do not wish to press my amendment to a vote. I know that the hon. Gentleman is not entirely happy with it, and there may be some practical difficulties for my right hon. Friend.

Mr. Alfred Morris: As the Minister may have heard, our estimate is that new clause 8 gives 80 per cent. of clause 1 of the Bill as now drafted. The Minister is an engineer and thus knows more than most about mathematics. I think that 80 per cent. is right, and we are prepared to take four-fifths of the loaf that we were seeking. So we accept the new clause.

This part of the Bill puts representation into rehabilitation. That is extremely important to disabled people and their families. Successful rehabilitation can be defined as giving the disabled person the right help, in the right place and at the right time. To allow representation where required is to make that objective more attainable. That is why we want to see adequate representation for disabled people wherever it is called for.

We have some important reservations about the amendment of the hon. Member for Halifax (Mr. Galley). I know he understands them and we are grateful to him for agreeing not to press it at this stage. There will no doubt be detailed consideration of this matter in the other place. It is our view, and he no doubt agrees with us, that the other place will have a role in considering anew this important part of the Bill.

Mr. Tom Clarke: I too welcome the fact that the Government have improved the proposals in the basic recommendations of the earlier consultation document. I particularly welcome the right of representation to all those aged 16-plus and to the parents of disabled children. I wish to put on record some points consistent with those of my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe (Mr. Morris).

The new clause is comprehensive, but a few matters will need to be considered carefully in another place, for example the restrictions in subsection (3) on the rights of representatives, and subsection (4) on access to people in hospital in advance of the implementation of subsection (9), for example to plan a discharge. The clause was introduced after a three-week consultation period. The Government now have far longer to consult health authorities before the Bill leaves the other place. Therefore, I hope and expect that the Minister will seek to complete his consultations before then and will introduce substantive amendments in the other place on Report or Third Reading.

In the first consultation exercise the principal representation received support from 21 of the 26 health bodies which responded by the deadline, including the National Association of Health Authorities, many of the RHAs and the Royal College of Nursing. It also received almost universal support from everyone else. I feel confident that that will be borne in mind in the other place, and that the Minister will consider these points carefully.

Mr. Greg Knight: It has not gone unnoticed by Conservative Members that the hon. Member for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke) has developed a worried expression. We can see that he is keeping one eye on the clock. I assure him that I support the new clause and the Bill and that I do not wish in any way to impede its passage. I hope that all my colleagues support the principle of the clause — the principle of an authorised representative having the right to present the case of a disabled person. There is a good reason for doing so, because often the presentation of a case is crucial to its outcome. A tribunal or an officer who must examine the circumstances may have his heart in the right place and wish to make the right decisions, but if the facts are not presented to him cogently and intelligibly, the decision may be incorrect and an injustice may result. We should all welcome the principle of allowing an authorised representative, a claimant's friend, to act as advocate.

I agree with the point made by the right hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, South (Mr. Ashley). I ask my right hon. Friend the Minister to reconsider in another place extending the provision to the Health Service. I am aware of the potential difficulties that that would create, but it is stretching worries too far to include clinical examinations in that connection. We are seeking to give a right to appoint an advocate to a disabled person. I cannot think of any reason why the advocate would need to be present at a clinical examination.

The Lord Chancellor has said that two heads are better than one, even if they are sheep's heads. Although he made that point in relation to advice given in court cases, the principle applies here. Right may often be on the disabled person's side, but he may not have the ability to present the case properly.

I have several questions which I hope that the Minister will answer before we move to the next new clause. I share the anxiety of the hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) in connection with subsection (1) and a person who does not have the ability to make the decision that he wishes to be represented. The House must be assured that that person will not thereby be denied the right to have an advocate to speak on his behalf. Subsection (2)(a) and (b) provide that it shall be the duty of a local authority, "To supply to the authorised representative any information, and . . . make available for his inspection any documents,". At whose expense will that be done? I hope that a local authority will not say, "There is a file that your advocate can see, but we shall require a photocopying charge or a production fee." I hope that in the spirit of this clause, local authorities will not seek to charge for providing such information.

Perhaps I am being overly suspicious, but in subsection (3) I am anxious about the circumstances in which the local authority will decide that it is harmful to the interests of the disabled person for him to be represented. That is like the prosecution telling the defence how to prepare its case.

[Mr. Greg Knight]

May I be given an example of when the Minister envisages a local authority saying, "It would not be in your interests to be represented by this person"?

I am also concerned about subsection (6). My hon. Friend the Member for Halifax (Mr. Galley) said that he was worried about an advocacy organisation acting without the interests of the disabled person at heart, whereas relatives would have the interests of the disabled person at heart. I do not agree with that argument. It is difficult to imagine a person who is there to act as advocate for the disabled person doing anything other than act in that person's interests, especially if he has no personal involvement in the issue. He is there to do a job and to help the disabled person. I can conceive of many instances in which the relative of a disabled person may have a family axe to grind. There may have been a dispute between brothers and sisters and, therefore, they might not act in the interests of the disabled person. I hope that the House will not accept the amendment of my hon. Friend the Member for Halifax. With those reservations, I welcome the new clause.

Mr. Yeo: I welcome the tone of the Minister's remarks when he introduced the new clause. I listened carefully to his comments outlining some of the problems that he believes could arise from the appointment of representatives in relation to the services provided by health authorities. I appreciate the potential difficulties, but they may be overcome. It is of the utmost importance that they should be overcome because few groups of disabled people are more in need of representatives than the residents of long-stay mental handicap hospitals. Many hon. Members who have experience in this area will know of cases where the lives of individuals have been transformed by the appointment of representatives. I urge my right hon. Friend to make every effort in the coming weeks to overcome the difficulties that he outlined so that that group can also benefit from the appointment of representatives.

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: I risk incurring your wrath, Mr. Deputy Speaker, by intervening briefly in the debate. Three matters should be emphasised more than they have been. The first is the need of the mentally disabled for representation. As my hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, South (Mr. Yeo) so ably said, the residents of long-stay mental handicap hospitals are those least able to appoint representatives to help them and those least able to help themselves without representation. Therefore, it is imperative, to get the proper results from the Bill, that a solution is found to the problem of providing them with representation.

The second matter arises from subsection (3). I do not believe that the formula in the Bill is adequate or appropriate. The local authority cannot be let off the hook so easily as it is by the excuse that, in any circumstances, on its judgment alone, it can withdraw documents or information from a representative because it believes that it is not in the interests of the disabled person for it to be provided. All hon. Members will have experience of occasions on which local government managers, harassed and overworked as they are, find it extremely convenient not to give information or co-operate fully with the people who will be affected by their decisions. I am confident that my fears will be justified when I say that if the clause goes ahead as drafted, there will be many instances of authorised representatives not being provided with essential information to enable them properly to carry out their functions.

It is also imperative that the provisions of the new clause are extended to the health authorities. Often, the mentally handicapped desperately need representation in their dealings with health authorities. On Second Reading, I told the House of my experience in my previous constituency. A mental handicap hospital was to be closed and the people living there were to be moved to a much larger and completely unsuitable home in the middle of a large city. Medical evidence showed that at least two of the patients would die if such a move was made. Had it not been for a local councillor and the then Minister of State, those people would have been moved and would have died. I was an intermediary. We saved those people only because of the personal involvement of a local councillor. Although she was not officially appointed as their representative, she took upon herself the duties of such a representative. There must be many other instances where people have not been so fortunate in being allocated care and where the machinery of bureaucracy has used them as pawns, moving them from place to place without adequately considering their needs. It is important for my right hon. Friend the Minister for Health to use his powers under subsection (9) to bring the health authorities within the ambit of the Bill.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I remind the House that we have a long way to go before we conclude consideration of the Bill.

Mr. Thurnham: I am a little disappointed that we have not been able to pin down details of the provision for the severely mentally handicapped. It is still not clear who should represent them. I again draw the attention of my right hon. Friend the Minister for Health to the case of children so distanced from their parents that the family cannot easily be considered to act as representatives for them.

I was interested in the remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for Halifax (Mr. Galley) about developments in pilot advocacy schemes. If charitable organisations can take this action, that would be one of the most obvious possibilities. I hope that the Government will pay full attention to this matter so that the details can be sorted out and amendments introduced in the other place at an early stage.

Mr. Hayhoe: The proposed amendment of my hon. Friend the Member for Halifax (Mr. Galley) would set out a hierarchy of people through which one would have to work tier by tier to establish the disabled person's choice. That would impose an unnecessary prescription.

These matters must be looked at in the context of regulations. In considering the regulations, I shall take account of the points of my hon. Friend the Member for Halifax who was concerned that the family should not be damaged by these arrangements. I hope that we all agree with that principle.

I welcome the general acceptance of this important major step in giving a new right of representation. I am glad that the changes have been generally accepted. My hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, South (Mr. Yeo) recognised the difficulties with respect to extending the right of representation to health authorities. Because I believe that those difficulties can be overcome, I have responded to the consultation by including the new power in the new clause. Discussions with the various concerned interests are needed to deal with the problems. The intention is to find a route to follow, and I think that that is in accord with the request of my hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, South.

My hon. Friend the Member for Derby, North (Mr. Knight) asked when it would be inappropriate to allow a representative to be involved without the disabled person's agreement. There may be occasions in problems of a sexual or related matter when the family's relationship could be damaged if a close relative — perhaps a husband or wife — were included as a representative. Those difficulties arise, but I do not think that I need say more. We are concerned with the interests of disabled individuals.

It has been suggested that subsection (3) may be used by local authorities to get out of their responsibilities because it is not convenient for them to act in a particular way. I am advised that the drafting of that subsection means that local authorities would have to be convinced that something was harmful to the interests of the individual concerned before the powers could be used.

I hope that I have said enough to show that the new clause deserves the support of the House. If necessary, the detailed points can be considered in the other place, although I think that many would be more appropriately dealt with in the regulations which are a consequence of this measure.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause read a Second time, and added to the Bill.

New Clause 9

ASSESSMENT BY LOCAL AUTHORITIES OF NEEDS OF DISABLED PERSONS

'(1) On any occasion when it falls to a local authority to decide whether the needs of a disabled person call for the provision by the authority (in accordance with any of the welfare enactments) of any statutory services for that person, the authority shall afford an opportunity to the disabled person or his authorised representative to make, within such reasonable period as the authority may allow for the purpose, representations to an officer of the authority as to any needs of the disabled person calling for the provision by the authority (in accordance with any of those enactments) of any statutory services for him.

(2) Where any such representations have been made to a local authority in accordance with subsection (1), and the authority have determined which statutory services (if any) should in their opinion be provided by them for the disabled person having regard to those representations, the authority shall, if so requested by the disabled person or his authorised representative, supply the person making the request with a written statement—

(a) specifying the statutory services (if any) that they propose to provide; and

(b) giving an explanation of their proposal.

(3) Where the local authority do not propose to provide any statutory services to meet a particular need identified in any representations under subsection (1), any statement supplied under subsection (2) must—

(a) state that fact together with the reasons why the authority do not propose to provide any such services, and

(b) inform the disabled person or his authorised representative of the right to make further representations under subsection (4).

(4) If the disabled person or his authorised representative is dissatisfied with any matter stated by the local authority in pursuance of subsection (3)(a), that person may, within such reasonable period as the authority may allow for the purpose, make further representations to an officer of the authority with respect to the particular need in question.

(5) Where any such representations have been made to the authority in accordance with subsection (4), the authority shall—

(a) reconsider, in the light of those representations, the question whether any statutory services should be provided as mentioned in subsection (3), and

(b) inform the disabled person or his authorised representative in writing of their decision on that question and their reasons for that decision.

(6) Where the disabled person or his authorised representative is unable to communicate, or (as the case may be) be communicated with, orally or in writing by reason of any mental of physical incapacity, the local authority shall provide such services as, in their opinion, are necessary to ensure that any such incapacity does not—

(a) prevent the authority from discharging their functions under this section in relation to the disabled person, or

(b) prevent the making of representations under this section by or on behalf of that person.

(7) In this section—

"representations" means representations made orally or in writing (or both); and

"statutory services"—

(a) in relation to England and Wales, means services under any arrangements which the local authority are required to make by virtue of any of the welfare enactments, and

(b) in relation to Scotland, means services which a local authority are required to provide themselves or by arrangement with another local authority, or with any voluntary or other body, in connection with the performance of the local authority's functions under the welfare enactments.'—[Mr. Hayhoe.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Hayhoe: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take amendments Nos. 2, 6 and 7.

Mr. Hayhoe: The provisions in clauses 2, 6 and 7 as drafted extend the responsibilities placed on local authorities to assess the needs of a disabled person for specific social services under section 2 of the Chronically Sick and Disabled Persons Act 1970 by requiring them to ensure that all relevant needs are considered, to supply the disabled person or representative with all the information used in making the assessment unless given to the authority in confidence, to allow the disabled person or representative to give their views before decisions are taken, to provide a written record of the assessment and to make appropriate referrals to other authorities, provided the disabled person or representative agrees.

The provisions require local authorities to provide an interpreter at their expense if requested by anyone involved in the assessment process if direct communication with the disabled person is not possible because of disability or inadequate command of English.

Clauses 6 and 7 set out more elaborate procedures to be followed by local authorities when assessing the needs of disabled persons under clauses 3, 4 and 5—children with special educational needs, mentally disabled people discharged from hospital and disabled people looked after by informal carers.

I shall not weary the House with a detailed commentary on clauses 6 and 7, because the intention of the Government's new clause 9 is to replace those clauses,

[Mr. Hayhoe]

The Government accept the underlying principle that disabled people should be given the right to a reasoned decision about the social services to which they are entitled and to make representations about them to the local authority.

Mr. Michael J. Martin (Glasgow, Springburn): As a councillor on a social work committee, I visited mentally retarded patients who were in the care of the committee but were living with a family, sometimes on isolated farms and in isolated communities. Will the right hon. Gentleman assure the House that such people will be offered the same facilities as people in the care of local authorities?

12.30 pm

Mr. Hayhoe: I should need to look at the precise implications. Equality of treatment seldom exists between local authorities, or even between different people. However, I shall look at that point.

I was dealing with the provisions of the new clause. I said that the clauses that the Government are seeking to replace contain, in the Government's view, over-rigid and bureucratic constraints upon the way in which local authorities discharge their functions. In some instances, they could delay the provision of services to disabled people. In particular, the Government are concerned that social services departments are required to assess the need for services which they have no duty to provide.

The proposed formula governing access to information would over-simplify a complex issue. Detailed guidance on disclosure of personal social services information has already been given to local authorities. The administrative cost of such a detailed assessment process and the demand for additional service provision would have substantial implications for local authority expenditure. We were sustained in that view by some of the comments received from the local authority associations.

Local authorities are already under a duty, under the Race Relations Act 1976, to make appropriate arrangements with a view to securing that their various functions are carried out with due regard to the need to promote equality of opportunity and good relations between persons of different racial groups. In appropriate circumstances, they will be required to provide interpretation services for people who cannot communicate in English. The foreign language problem is therefore dealt with in other ways. In this clause we are dealing with communication problems that arise from disability.

The effect of the Government's new clause will be to require local authorities, when assessing a disabled person's need for social services, to provide an opportunity for the disabled person, or his representative, to make representations on the need for social services, as they perceive them, and, if requested by the disabled person or his representative, to provide a written statement that outlines the services they intend to provide, to give an explanation of the basis upon which the assessment has been made; to provide an opportunity for the disabled person or his representative to make further representations within a reasonable period about particular needs; to consider such further representations and to inform the disabled person or his representative of the outcome and the reasons for the decision; and to provide appropriate interpretation services for disabled people, or their representatives, who are unable to communicate normally because of disability. We propose with new clause 10 to amend in the same way the provisions governing interpreters in that part of the Bill which relates to carers.

This important clause also has considerable resource implications, particularly for local authorities. Apart from that, they will need time in which to gear themselves up for undertaking the assessments that are provided for in the new clause. Therefore, in all honesty I must place on record the fact that the resource and administrative implications will have to be taken into account by the Government when they introduce the commencement orders for these measures.

I commend the new clause to the House.

Mr. Ashley: I hope, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that the House was listening very carefully a few moments ago when your predecessor in the Chair said that we have a long way to go before we dispose of the Bill. Accordingly, therefore, I shall cut down what would have been a half-hour speech to one of 30 seconds. Clause 6, which provides for interpreters, is inadequate. It says that local authorities will provide interpreters if they are necessary.

Local authorities are good, bad, and indifferent. The bad and the indifferent ones will not provide interpreters. That is a matter of very great significance to deaf people. It is not a matter of words but of what is meant by what is said. Deaf people know what they require. I hope that this clause will be reconsidered and amended in another place.

Mr. Tom Clarke: I welcome the news of my right hon. Friend the Member for Stoke-on-Trent, South (Mr. Ashley), and I share his worries about the time factor. As my right hon. Friend is chairman of the all-party group, which has given enormous support to the Bill, for which we are all grateful, we must take on board the important point that my right hon. Friend has made.

We are grateful to the Government for the progress that has been made on the issue of assessment. It would be churlish to say otherwise. New clause 9 is comprehensive and greatly improves the services which disabled people will receive. We have not got all that we wanted and there are some details which need examining. That is especially true of interpretation, which my right hon. Friend has mentioned. It appears that a disabled person can be excluded as he is unlikely to be able to communicate with the authorities. Overall I am pleased with the Government's response. If this new clause is approved we shall have made considerable progress.

Mr. Alfred Morris: As with new clause 8, conventional wisdom on this side of the House regarding new clause 9 is that the Government are giving 80 per cent. of what was proposed in the original Bill. We accept what is offered.

To put it another way, it is rather like demolishing what we thought was a very desirable residence and replacing it with a rather less attractive residence. Nevertheless needs must and we accept the Government's proposition.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause read a Second time, and added to the Bill.

New Clause 10

DUTY OF LOCAL AUTHORITY TO TAKE INTO ACCOUNT ABILITIES OF CARER

' . Where—

(a) a disabled person is living at home and receiving a substantial amount of care on a regular basis from another person (who is not a person employed to provide such care by any body in the exercise of its functions under any enactment), and

(b) it falls to a local authority to decide whether the disabled person's needs call for the provision by them of any services for him under any of the welfare enactments, the local authority shall, in deciding that question, have regard to the ability of that other person to continue to provide such care on a regular basis.'—[Mr. Newton.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take amendment (a), at end add 'and shall determine the need of that other person for support and assistance in providing the care required to enable the disabled person to remain living at home.'

and Government amendment No. 5.

The Minister for Social Security (Mr. Tony Newton): I am conscious that in presenting new clause 10 I am in the odd position as Minister with responsibility for the disabled of taking part, for the first time, in the proceedings.

The House will understand if I use the words used earlier by my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie) that I too have been removed from public life by the proceedings of the Social Security Bill upstairs. I am not quite sure whether I would regard that as being removed from public life, but it certainly is as obscure as it is strenuous. There will be those in the House who feel that a Minister for Social Security who has been through the last two months of argument, especially on severe weather, would welcome a period of obscurity. In some ways that is true.

I express my regret to the House that I have been unable to take part in the earlier proceedings. I had a conflicting engagement this morning, also of great importance to disabled people. I attended a conference on the McColl report on the artificial limb and appliance service. I notice that the hon. Member for Eccles (Mr. Carter-Jones) appears not to have heard about that. It was organised in Kensington by Therapy Weekly. I spent an hour and a quarter at the conference this morning.

I would like to take an opportunity to pay my own tribute to the hon. Member for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke) and other hon. Members, including the hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) who have played an important part in presenting the proposals. The hon. Gentlemen have played a constructive part in working with the Government to reach the present position.

Albeit in his absence, I pay tribute to my right hon. Friend the Minister for Health who, because of my absence and other commitments, has taken a special interest in the Bill. He has played a skillful and constructive part, along with the Opposition Members. I only hope that my own interest which I can assure but not prove, but which has been expressed behind the scenes, has been helpful and constructive.

The House will be aware that the Government strongly support the principle which inspired the original clause presented by the hon. Member for Monklands, West which is clause 5 in the Bill as it stands. The same principle underlines the Government's new clause 10 which is intended to replace clause 5.

We recognise the vital role of informal carers in providing support for disabled people who live in the community. We have tried to reflect that in a variety of ways recently, including the important work being done in and through the Department's social work service, now the social services inspectorate. For example, we have mounted a variety of studies and seminars, in which I have taken part occasionally, to draw much greater attention to the needs of informal carers and to encourage those engaged in the provision of services to take more account of those needs in their services.

Despite that, we did not feel, as my right hon. Friend will have explained earlier, that clause 5 was acceptable in view of the open-ended statutory obligation it imposed on local authorities and of the potentially large implications for them and for resources going well beyond those already represented by other parts of the Bill. We therefore propose to replace clause 5 with new clause 10, which would require social services departments, when assessing the needs of a disabled person in receipt of a substantial amount of regular care from any person other than an employee of the statutory services, to have regard to the carer's ability to continue to provide that care.

Although that provision is in several respects more limited than the hon. Member for Monklands, West would have wished, it goes further in one respect. Following the consultatio exercise, we concluded that it would be impracticable to restrict the definition of carer to people in the same household as the disabled person, so new clause 10 extends the definition of carer to include any person who provides a substantial amount of regular informal care. I hope that that modification is thought sensible.

I should like to say something about amendment (a) and the starred amendment (b), which has been tabled by the hon. Member for Caernarfon but has not been selected. Apart from a minor technical objection, which I shall not go into, we are anxious that amendment (a) would virtually restore the open-ended commitment which we felt unable to accept in the original clause. I know that the hon. Member for Monklands, West doubts whether the interpretation of his amendment is correct but I am sure that he recognises that, in the letter circulated to all of us today by the Association of County Councils, it says that new clause 10 is probably all that is possible. It also says that it is anxious about the additional resource consequences which would be reflected if the amendment were incorporated.

It is with some regret that I cannot advise the House to accept amendment (a). If the hon. Gentleman and the House are ready to accept my advice, I shall re-examine new clause 10 to see whether there is any way in which we can modify our proposal to help meet the hon. Gentleman's concern. That is not a commitment beyond a genuine commitment to examine the matter. I shall also consider amendment (b), which would extend the new clause fairly generally to clarify the anxiety that underlies both amendments.

We must accept that a balance has to be found between taking what I regard as a valuable step forward in new clause 10 to recognise the needs of carers more by doing so in an Act of Parliament and writing into the Bill a provision with potential resource implications which might mean considerable deferment of the time when it is possible to bring the provision into effect under the commencement order procedure.

12.45 pm

We must ensure proper recognition of the need to consider the position of carers. My concern is such that I would rather have a clause that we can hope to bring into effect reasonably quickly than one which while it might represent a world to which we hope to be able to move in due course, might delay introducing effective legislation that recognises the problems that face carers.

If the House is willing to accept the new clause in the spirit in which it has been tabled, it would be one of the Bill's provisions that we could hope to bring into effect at an early stage.

Mr. Tom Clarke: Again, I shall attempt to be brief, although the issue which is raised by the new clause is an extremely important one and invites a much longer debate than time allows.

My amendment sought to emphasise that our aim should be to enable disabled persons to remain living at home. That was the purpose of the amendment that was moved in Committee with universal approval by my right hon. Friend the Member for Stoke-on-Trent, South (Mr. Ashley).

The second purpose of the amendment is to confirm that an assessment of a disabled person's needs could be demanded by the carer. Circular 12/70 of the DHSS implies that a local authority must assess all disabled persons whether or not they want to be assessed. That is 100 per cent. automatic assessment. That does not happen and delays between requests for assessment and assessment are often long. I believe that the existing law needs clarification, and it is not my purpose to extend it. There has been some misunderstanding about the amendment.

The Minister has said—I am sure after great thought —that there is a technical objection to the amendment, and I must consider that seriously, which I do. I take on board that he has said that he will re-examine these matters, including the amendment of the hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley), which has not been selected. When the Minister has an opportunity to carry out that re-examination, I ask him to take into account the discussions that we had in Committee and the representations that we have received from many professional bodies and voluntary organisations as well as individuals in response to the document on resources which was produced by the Government. I hope that we can take up that issue again on Third Reading.

I am certain that the group which is making the greatest contribution towards coping with the problems faced by the disabled and saving the Treasury the most money is that which is formed by carers. That said, the Minister is right when he says that it would be wrong if Parliament, in undertaking a serious review of the disabled, took a decision which had not been properly considered. I would not want to take that risk. The problem is too important to allow that to happen and carers deserve much more consideration than a hasty decision. Without withdrawing one iota from the commitment of the sponsors of the Bill towards carers, I do not propose to press my amendment.

Mr. Rowe: There would be tremendous medium and long-term savings in looking after carers a great deal better than at present. A horrifying proportion of carers are more than 60 years of age and many of them are suffering from a wide variety of potential or existing disabilities because of the pressure under which they live. More than anything else they need some form of respite care and, even as far as the Government have gone, that is a very important step.

I should like to make a point similar to the one I made earlier. I believe that there is enormous scope far beyond anything that the Government have so far admitted, for using those currently unemployed, especially young people, through the community programme and other ways to provide the respite for carers that we are talking about and support for handicapped people in their own homes. It has been estimated that more than 2 million handicapped people are looked after at home and the opportunities for using the community programme are colossal. The experience of community service volunteers with the independent living scheme is an indicator in one direction and its experience of placing more than 2,000 young people every year at a cost of £300 per head a year in this way is a clear sign of what can be done. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister, who knows so much about this subject will urge the Paymaster General, who says that in his experience the scope does not exist, to look at the possibility of setting up in his own Department, in conjuction with the community programme, the kind of national scheme which would give carers the support they need. If he does not provide that support, he will land the Health Service with a colossal bill because it will break down.

Mr. Wigley: I shall be brief for obvious reasons, because I have been exhorting other people to be brief.

The position of carers is extremely important, as the Minister has said today and on other occasions. Although it is not possible to go as far in the Bill as we had originally hoped, I trust that we can consider whether new clause 10 can be more finely tuned to achieve the objectives referred to by the Minister. I thank the Minister for his willingness to respond.

Amendment (b) is starred, so we cannot take it on board today. However, perhaps between now and the Bill's consideration in another place it will be possible to see the difference between amendment (a) and amendment (b). Amendment (a) refers to determining "the needs of that other person" and amendment (b) refers to

"whether by making available additional services, the provision of that care may be maintained.'"

There is a difference in that it does not bring in an additional assessment procedure, but tries to help the Government to achieve their objective of giving support to enable a disabled person to remain in the community. As a responsibility for assessment of disabled person already exists, all we are doing is extending the Government's clause to provide that the local authorities, in assessing that need, shall also have regard to "whether by making additional services available, the provision of that care may be maintained."

That is a compromise between amendment (a) and where the Government start. It may give an opportunity to achieve our aim—in other words, to provide services to help disabled people to remain in the community without bringing about an additional bureaucracy of any sort or additional assessment procedures which may consume resources. At the same time, we should be able to direct services to where there has been maximum impact and by doing that avoid the additional public cost of people having to go into institutional care which is unacceptable for social reasons. There may be room for consideration along those lines in another place, and if the Minister will ensure that we will be grateful.

Mr. Thurnham: The clause draws attention to the great job done by carers and the massive cost involved in the provisions to give them adequate help. I have been happy to support new clauses 11 and 12, but the cost aspect has caused concern. I note that the hon. Member for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke) has said that he will not press his proposal.

My hon. Friend the Member for Exeter (Mr. Hannam) would have liked to speak on this clause if he was here. He has asked me to apologise for his absence. I understand that the Prime Minister is visiting his constituency to look at new facilities for the disabled, and that is why he felt unable to be here today. He has asked me to add his congratulations to those already given to the hon. Member for Monklands, West on his work in introducing the Bill and on the Government's warm and positive response to the spirit of it and their backing of the need for resources.

I should like to mention again to my hon. Friend the Minister the points made by the Association of County Councils in a letter that I received today. The ACC cautioned that if a Act is put on the statute book but not implemented, that can lead to considerable difficulties. The ACC refers to the fact that "the proviso of deferring implementation until those resources are available has proved problematic in the past. The Children Act 1975, for example, was implemented piecemeal over more than 10 years which contributed in no small measure to the current confusions and complexities of child care law. The Government should accept the need to discuss with those responsible for giving effect to the Bill a proper programme of implementation fully resourced at each stage."

I am sure that the hon. Member for Monklands, West in putting forward the compromises that he has, will expect to see the Bill implemented to a proper timetable as soon as it is on the statute book.

Mr. Carter-Jones: Some hon. Members have buzz words and buzz expressions. My right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe (Mr. Morris) always argues that where one sees a disabled person, one sees a disabled family. Amendment (a) goes to the heart of the matter. The carer is absolutely essential, and often is part of the family.

I have a buzz word in the House. When I talk about disability I always talk about "slice by slice". I am a great salami expert. We have had two slices of salami today. I hope, from what the Minister said, that there is a slight chance that he has got the knife over another small slice and will move a little further towards helping us. Even the Americans, in the latest report on independence, produced by the Council for the Handicapped, made that very point.

I make this one plea to the Minister. He and I have talked often about the use of advanced technology to allow disabled people and their families to have some form of independent living. We are making considerable progress, but when we talk about the mentally handicapped and the mentally ill, it is not so easy to provide what is needed in the way of environmental controllers to give that independence. Therefore, the carer becomes more important than ever and is of deep consequence and significance for the family.

I hope that the Minister will think carefully about his half promise. If he made it a firm promise, I should be happy.

Mr. Kennedy: The caring issue particularly interests and concerns me. Of all the things in the Bill, what attracted me in particular was the opportunity at long last to have this recognised in legislation. At first we did not know what form the recognition would take. However, it is important that there is some recognition of the role and contribution of informal carers, and of local authorities having to take those people into account in their planning, services and so on.

As there appears to be further compromise going on between the promoter of the Bill, the hon. Member for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke), and the Minister, which is welcome, I hope that once the measure becomes law the Government will, in the spirit of the Bill and their own clause, take further opportunities to try to encourage local authorities to enter into voluntary agreements with carers on the provision that can be made available to them. I accept that there are revenue stipulations. There is an enormous amount to be done.

I echo what the hon. Member for Eccles (Mr. Carter-Jones) has said, that we have many highly charged political debates in the Chamber about the future of the welfare state. We all agree that if it were not for the informal, and often unnoticed and insufficiently supported, caring sector in our community, the welfare state would be in a state of crisis and collapse. Therefore, anything that gives legislative recognition to the position of carers, as the new clause does, is welcome.

1 pm

Mr. Ashley: I felt slightly worried until, a few moments ago, my hon. Friend the Member for Eccles (Mr. Carter-Jones) made his standard salami speech, and I know now that we are back on course and having a normal debate on disability.

The Minister must have felt uncomfortable when speaking about new clause 10, because he is aware of the problem of carers. Some time ago, in chilly Westminster Hall, he received a deputation, which I led, of appallingly disabled people and their carers. He listened sympathetically, and the case was put vividly by those carers whose lives have been devastated.

Some Members who have spoken today have got the costs all wrong, as have the Government, because costs will be saved by helping carers. If a carer cannot cope, both the disabled person and the carer will go into hospital and the cost will become astronomic. This is a saving measure, and a humanitarian one. It is a cliché to say that we cannot afford to do anything, but it is true. We cannot afford not to help carers. Carers are an exploited section of our community. They save the Government, not just the DHSS, billions of pounds. I hope that carers will be helped because they deserve to be and because they will help the Government. I am glad that the Minister will reconsider the issue.

Mr. Alfred Morris: The Minister said that he would look at new clause 10 to see whether it could be strengthened. It can be strengthened. Our view is that new clause 10 merely reflects existing local authority practice. I understand that that is also the view of the Association of County Councils. We hope that the Minister's review of what he is proposing will proceed urgently and that there will be more official understanding than we have seen so far of the vital importance—I use the word "vital" in its literal sense—of recognising the centrality of the role played by carers of disabled people.

We are extremely reluctant to see any dilution of the Bill's provisions on this important matter. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Stoke-on-Trent, South (Mr. Ashley) said, if the carer breaks down, then two people can find themselves in institutions. It is both self-defeating and inhumane not to help the carer where that can vouchsafe the independence of the disabled person. Our fundamental concern is not to delay the proceedings on the Bill and thus, although reluctantly, we accept what the Minister has said.

The hon. Member For Exeter (Mr. Hannam) played an important part in the discussions on this matter in Committee. We appreciate why he cannot be with us today, and I join in the compliments that have been paid to his tireless efforts in support of the Bill.

Mr. Newton: I warmly endorse what has been said about my hon. Friend the Member for Exeter (Mr. Hannam) who has played an important and constructive part in our debates. I intervene again to make sure that I cannot later be accused of having misled the House. I am conscious, as the House knows, of the needs and problems of carers, and I am anxious to advance in a number of ways the extent to which we recognise and meet those needs throughout the variety of our provisions and not just those covered by the Bill.

In fairness to all, I must make it clear that in what I said about looking again at amendment (a), tabled by the hon. Member for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke), and amendment (b) tabled by the hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley), I do not wish to suggest that I see an opportunity greatly to widen the scope of the Government's new clause in a form that would have substantial resource implications. As I understood the hon. Member for Monklands, West, he did not feel that his amendment had those implications. If it could be shown that his interpretation of the amendment was right and that ours was wrong, or that we could make some other change that would help to meet anxieties, I would be willing to look at that. But I cannot give a commitment to conduct an extensive review of new clause 10 in a way that would give the impression that we would greatly extend and expand its scope in terms of its resource implications. I would not like to mislead anyone about that.

Mr. Tom Clarke: The Minister referred to the possible interpretations of my amendment and undertook to reconsider it. Will that be in time for the Government's views to be considered by the other place?

Mr. Newton: If I could see any way of achieving a satisfactory compromise between the different interpretations of the hon. Gentleman's amendment, I would hope that it might be done in time for the debate in the other place. However, I do not wish to leave any room for doubt. I do not believe it is possible for the Government to recommend amendments in the other place that will clearly greatly increase still further the Bill's resource implications. In so far as we are talking about amendments that make the purpose of new clause 10 clearer, I certainly undertake to look at them. But I cannot undertake to incorporate or recommend amendments that would increase still further the Bill's resource implications.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause read a Second time, and added to the Bill.

New Clause 13

POWERS OF THE COURTS IN RESPECT OF DISABLED PERSONS

'The following subsections shall be inserted into section 2 of the Chronically Sick and Disabled Persons Act 1970:—

"(3) Without prejudice to any remedy prescribed by this Act or by any other statutory provision, it shall be the right of any person to make application to the appropriate court;

(i) has failed to make reasonable provision for any of the needs of that person in respect of which arrangements are to be made under subsections (1) hereof; or

(ii) refuses to assess any or all of the needs of that person in order to determine whether those needs are matters in respect of which arrangements have to be made under subsection (1) of this section;

(b) in the case of any other person, where a local authority has determined that that person is not a person to whom section 1(1) applies.

(4) An application under subsection (3) may be made by any person in respect of whom it is claimed that subsection (1) applies provided that, where (an appointment has been made in accordance with section 1 of the Disabled Persons (Services, Consultation and Representation) Act, the application may be made by the person so appointed.

(5) On an application made under subsection (3), without prejudice to any other powers of the court, the appropriate court may:

(a) make a declaration as to whether any arrangements made in accordance with subsection (1) of this section are reasonable to meet the needs of the person by or on behalf of whom the application is made;

(b) make a declaration that the needs of any person by or on behalf of whom the application is made are needs in respect of which arrangements have to be made under subsection (1) of this section;

(c) make a declaration that a person is a person to whom subsection 1(1) of this Act applies;

(d) make a declaration as to the arrangements which it is necessary for a local authority to make under subsection (1) of this section for any person by or on behalf of whom application is made;

(e) award damages to any person by or on behalf of whom application is made where a declaration is made under paragraphs (a), (b) or (c) of this subsection in respect of any period during which:

(ii) the local authority has refused to assess any need of a person to whom subsection (1) applies to determine whether it is a need in respect of which arrangements would have to be made under that subsection, provided that the court shall only award damages for any need in respect of which arrangements would have had to have been made;

(iii) the local authority has determined that a person is not a person to whom subsection (1) applies and the court has granted a declaration in accordance with paragraph (c) hereof, provided that the court is satisfied that arrangements should have been made under subsection (1) in respect of any needs of that person and no such arrangements were made.

(6) The appropriate court for the purposes of subsections (3) and (5) is:

(a) the county court except in a case falling within paragraph (b) hereof;

(b) the High Court in accordance with the provisions of section 31 of the Supreme Court Act 1981 where the relief sought includes an order of mandamus.".'.—[Mr. Cohen.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Harry Cohen (Leyton): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): With this it will be convenient to take Government amendment No. 8.

Mr. Cohen: I should like to give my congratulations to my hon. Friend the Member for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke) on his excellent Bill. I am aware that time is short, and as I wish to see the Bill make progress, I shall be as brief as possible.

The new clause strengthens the Bill by providing better legal rights for the disabled. It comes via NETWORK, the law and advisory centre for the handicapped and their families, which does valuable work in supplying desperately needed legal assistance to many of the disabled and their families, including some of my constituents. Indeed, I welcome the decision announced this week to award it a central Government grant.

The new clause is the opposite of Government amendment No. 8, which continues the current restrictions on a disabled person making an application to the court under section 2 of the Chronically Sick and Disabled Persons Act. My new clause gives any person a direct right to make an application to the court. It also gives the court power to make declarations on whether existing arrangements are reasonable in order to meet the needs of the disabled person, and on what arrangements the local authority should make for him.

The court will also have the power to award damages if the local authority has failed to make reasonable provision and if it has refused to assess a disabled person's need. The new clause ensures that local authorities carry out their duties to the disabled as, if they do not do so, they could face the sanctions of the court. It is clearly not right that Parliament's stated aim to achieve better conditions for the disabled should not be fully accessible, through the courts, to disabled individuals. Yet that is the case now, particularly as under the Chronically Sick and Disabled Persons Act, long delays in exercising ministerial or local authority powers to take a case to court can deny rights.

The new clause seeks to tackle that, and to provide full access to the court. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe (Mr. Morris) said in Committee, we are not seeking new rights but the better enforcement of existing rights. Indeed, as I know that he wants to say a word on this important issue, I shall sit down.

Mr. Alfred Morris: My hon. Friend the Member for Leyton (Mr. Cohen) was eminently correct to say that we are seeking not new rights for disabled people but the better enforcement of existing rights for which Parliament has already given its sanction and made provision. It will be argued that at present disabled people can go to the Secretary of State for Social Services with a request that he should use his default powers if they believe that they are being unjustly treated by local authorities. Yet there has been unconscionable delay in the handling of complaints from the Royal Association for Disability and Rehabilitation, as from other organisations. It is now widely felt that procedures could be speeded up in a way that would help more disabled people to achieve the benefits made for them by the House of Commons.

In this regard, I must make it clear that a mandatory duty already exists under the 1970 Act to assess the needs of disabled people. Financial factors are legally an irrelevant criterion in the assessment of needs; if need is accepted there is a mandatory duty to make the arrangements required. It may still come as a surprise to some, in both town and county halls, that the rights of disabled people are that strong under the law as it now stands.

I know that my hon. Friend the Member for Leyton does not wish to press his amendment to a division. He is extremely conscious, as I am, of the need to proceed quickly to Third reading. However, I hope that the Minister, in replying, will accept that there is now a compelling need to speed up the process of dealing with the complaints of disabled people, more especially when they are supported by organisations that Members on both sides of the House respect.

Mr. Newton: In the light of what has been said by the hon. Member for Leyton (Mr. Cohen) and the right hon. Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe (Mr. Morris), I hope it will not be discourteous if I do not rehearse at length the details of the Government's argument that led us to wish to delete present clause 8, thus leading us to resist new clause 13. I will comment briefly on what the right hon. Member for Wythenshawe said about default inquiries under section 36 of the National Assistance Act 1948. I undertake to consider at greater length than the two minutes I have had so far what he has said. He will know that a number of applications have been made under that section of the 1948 Act and inquiries made, but as yet no default order has been made by a Secretary of State of any political colour. It is important to recognise that in several cases the inquiries that have been initiated by the relevant Minister and the Department have led to a change of policy, at least for the individual concerned, even though in other cases it has been found that the authority had in fact met its duty.

I realise that sometimes criticism is made of the time taken to make such inquiries, but I have to recognise that the first stage in such an inquiry is necessarily to seek the comments and response of the local authority concerned. In itself, that can often take some time. I certainly hope that these matters will be dealt with expeditiously. I note the criticism that the right hon. Gentleman has made and I shall certainly take it into account in considering whether there is any action I can take at present that would help to ease anxieties.

Mr. Cohen: I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 10

INFORMATION

1.15 pm

Mr. Newton: I beg to move amendment No. 10, in page 8, line 4, leave out from '1970,' to end of line 7 and insert—

(a) for "any other of those services" there shall be "any other service provided by the authority (whether under any such arrangements or not)"; and

(b) at the end there shall be inserted "and of any service provided by any other authority or organisation which in the opinion of the authority is so relevant and of which particulars are in the authority's possession.".'.

The background to the amendment is that by amending section 1(2)(b) of the Chronically Sick and Disabled Persons Act 1970, clause 10 of the Bill will require local authorities to inform a recipient of services under that Act, and of other services provided by the authority, Government Department, public body or voluntary organisation which are considered relevant to that person's needs. They already have a duty to provide information about services provided under the 1970 Act.

I need hardly say that the Government are sympathetic to the objectives of the clause. However, we have reservations on two points. First, to place a statutory requirement on local authorities to obtain information from a number of other agencies on the services available could represent a substantial additional administrative burden, which would be difficult in itself. Secondly, the clause as drafted appears to take no account of the problems which could arise for a local authority given that proposed statutory commitment, if the information that it needed was not provided by the other organisations from whom it would necessarily need to obtain it. Therefore, we propose to amend clause 10 so that local authorities will be required to provide information about other services provided by the same authority, and about other services provided by other organisations which the local authority considers relevant and information about which is available to it. I hope that the House will think that that is a reasonable compromise and a helpful advance.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 11

CO-OPTION OF DISABLED PEOPLE TO COMMITTEES

Mr. Galley: I beg to move amendment No. 11, in page 8, line 13 after 'people', insert

'or of people with special knowledge of such disablement'.

This is a minor amendment, but I have noted the concern expressed to me privately by the hon. Member for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke) about its effect. The principle behind clause 11 is that some disabled people cannot readily speak and act for themselves. When such a disabled person cannot act in any consultative capacity, it seems reasonable to allow people with special knowledge of that particular disability to do so. On that basis it does not seem unreasonable to extend the principle of consultation, as well as the appointments from groups of people with special knowledge, when disabled persons cannot speak for themselves. That is a minor matter, but I note that the hon. Gentleman is a little worried about the amendment and suggests that it would be better to consider it in another place. Therefore, I certainly do not wish to press it.

Mr. Newton: In the light of that, rather than taking up time expressing my reservations about the amendment—although I must say that in our view it would be technically inoperative, apart from anything else—I shall accept with good grace my hon. Friend's decision not to press the amendment.

Mr. Galley: I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 12

REPORTS TO PARLIAMENT

Amendment made: No. 12, in page 8, line 14, leave out clause 12.—[Mr. Hayhoe.]

Clause 13

REPORT BY SECRETARY OF STATE ON DISABLED CHILDREN IN SPECIAL EDUCATION

Mr. Newton: I beg to move amendment No. 13, in page 8, line 27, leave out clause 13.

The clause, which was added in Committee, would require the Secretary of State to lay before each House of Parliament annually such information as he had obtained from local authorities on the operation of the Education Act 1981 in respect of disabled people. The Government believe that this aditional requirement is unnecessary since the Secretary of State already has sufficient powers under section 92 of the Education Act 1944 to obtain any information that he requires from local education authorities. Moreover, statistical information about special education provision is already published in a document called "Statistics of Education: Schools". To impose this additional requirement would be an unnecessary additional load for both central and local Government. Therefore, I hope that the House will accept our amendment to delete clause 13.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 14

STRUCTURE PLANS

Mr. Newton: I beg to move amendment No. 14, in page 8, line 31, leave out clause 14.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss amendment No. 18.

Mr. Newton: By amending the Town and Country Planning Act 1971 and the Local Government Act 1985, clause 14 would require planning authorities in the development plan process to do three things: first, to give special consideration to the needs of disabled people; secondly, to take appropriate measures to improve the physical environment for disabled people; and, thirdly, to provide disabled people with adequate information and opportunities to make representations about local and structure plans. Planning authorities would also be required to have regard to the relevant provisions of the Chronically Sick and Disabled Persons Act and of building regulations about access for disabled people when considering applications for certain types of development.

The Government accept that planning authorities should have regard to the needs of disabled people in carrying out their duties, but clause 14 seeks to introduce an inappropriate level of detail into the legislation, especially given that the existing legislation already provides, in more general terms, for local planning authorities to have regard to the needs of disabled people where appropriate, to give adequate publicity to their proposals for structure and local plans, and not least to have regard to the relevant provisions of the Chronically Sick and Disabled Persons Act. It would be inappropriate to require local planning authorities when considering planning applications to have regard to building regulations, which are a separate procedure.

Amendment No. 14 would omit clause 14 from the Bill. Amendment No. 18 is consequential to amendment No. 14. If it transpires that the attention of planning authorities needs to be directed more closely to the needs of disabled people, that could be done in the form of guidance from the Department of the Environment. I understand that my colleagues there are considering whether such guidance might be helpful.

Mr. Wigley: Can the Minister give me an undertaking that he and his colleagues will consider seriously the possibility of guidelines drawing to the attention of local authorities the benefits that have been provided in areas that have tried that approach? There have been positive benefits for disabled people. It does not matter how it is done, provided that the objectives are achieved and the needs of disabled people are taken into account at all opportunities in the work of the authorities within the confines of structure planning.

Mr. Newton: I have the greatest sympathy with the hon. Gentleman's comments and I shall draw them to the attention of my colleagues at the Department of the Environment, who have more than shown their good faith in this connection during the past year or 18 months with the important changes that have been made to building regulations to improve the extent to which new buildings, especially those to which the public have access, take better account of the needs for access of disabled people. They have made some important progress in that area in the past year, and I have no doubt that my colleagues will be more than happy to do anything that they believe will genuinely help.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 16

ADVANCEMENT OF HEALTH OF PEOPLE IN SCOTLAND

Mr. John MacKay: I beg to move amendment No. 15, in page 9, line 36, leave out Clause 16.

I share the anxiety expressed by hon. Members on both sides of the House that effective joint planning arrangements should operate in Scotland and that there should be participation by the voluntary organisations. That was one feature of the new planning arrangements which we introduced a year ago. They have been implemented by health boards and local authorities, and progress has been achieved. It would not be wise to abandon what has been done and brand the arrangements as a failure without allowing reasonable time for the important results that we are seeking to secure to emerge fully.

Another point of concern is that the detailed statutory arrangements in clause 16 would apply only to the disabled, not to the full range of priority groups to which the existing joint planning arrangements are fully directed. Clearly, one main group about which we are worried is the elderly, and it is important that, as at present, the joint planning committees should cover them as well as the disabled groups specified in the Bill.

[Mr. John MacKay]

I am well aware of the strong views of voluntary bodies that joint planning in Scotland should have a statutory basis. Other interests must be considered. I am convinced that the present voluntary arrangements can work. Statutory prescription and the creation of a bureaucratic structure are not substitutes for willingness, freely expressed, to work together. There is no difference between the Bill's sponsor and myself on the merits of joint planning committees although he takes a more pessimistic view of the likelihood of success of my circular last year. Time has still to show which of us is right.

I am receiving encouraging reports from health boards. There is a great deal of activity, and reports are at various stages of preparation. It has been put to me that I should take the opportunity of this legislation to give the Secretary of State powers to ensure these results. Clause 16 does that by prescribing a range of matters in detail. I have been reluctant to go along with that method. In Committee, the hon. Member for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke) described my right hon. Friend and I as Mr. Nice and Mr. Nasty, from some television programme, and could not decide who was who. I wish to add to his inability to decide by showing a certain flexibility. I hope that I can go some way towards meeting the hon. Gentleman's genuine aim to give joint planning statutory backing. I should like my circular and the voluntary approach to produce the goods we both want.

I would be prepared to seek statutory powers to enable my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to prescribe for joint planning committees and their activities. These powers would not need to be brought into operation if the current arrangements prove successful. If it is decided that the voluntary route is not proving satisfactory, my right hon. Friend will be able to enforce the arrangements laid down in the circular and any other desirable aspects that he chooses to include in the regulations. Health boards and local authorities would therefore have to carry out the aims to which my circular addressed itself.

If the House agrees to delete clause 16, I shall ensure that either a suitable extension to clause 15 or a separate new clause is brought forward in another place. In addition, it will be necessary to deal with the exclusion of the elderly — the hon. Member for Monklands, West very much appreciates this point—by amending the long title for this specific purpose. I hope that those two points are acceptable to the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Tom Clarke: I welcome the speech of the Under-Secretary of State. None of us is looking for complaints. Despite what was said in Committee about Mr. Nice and Mr. Nasty, I shall reserve my judgment until I see what happens on Third Reading.

There has been a good, well-informed debate in Scotland on joint planning, and I am glad that the Under-Secretary of State appears to have listened to it. Judging by his last few sentences, we are well on the way towards convincing him that the time for joint planning of a voluntary nature in Scotland is fast disappearing. No one has disputed the success of joint planning in England and Wales, given the statutory backing there. I believe that the objective, which the Under-Secretary of State and I share, of seeking successful joint planning would be better met by the type of statutory support which the hon. Gentleman led me to believe was possible when the matter is considered in the other place. This is so important a matter that the health boards alone are not always the best bodies to take the final decision without the kind of consultation that takes place in England and Wales with those involved in social services, housing and the voluntary organisations which know so much about these problems. It is very much in the interests of democratic policy formulation in Scotland that their views should be taken into account.

I am delighted that the Minister appears to accept the main thrust of the representations that were made to him and to his Department when the consultative document was published. We have made considerable progress. I was delighted when the Minister mentioned a full range of priorities, including the elderly. Our goal was not so ambitious. However, it is splendid if the Minister intends to go that far. We welcome it. When this matter goes to another place, the debates that we have had on these issues will do nothing but good. In that spirit, I thank the Minister.

1.30 pm

Mr Dewar: It is accepted on all sides of the House that this has been a useful and helpful day. Although we have not got everything that we wanted from the Scottish Office, the Minister has gone some way towards meeting our wishes. He said that he is flexible. I thought I heard the joints creaking a little but undoubtedly he has made an effort and we are grateful to him. I am delighted that the hon. Member for Dundee, East (Mr. Wilson) is present for the debate. It shows the efficiency of the Welsh Nationalists' whipping arrangements. The hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) should be congratulated.

This is an important matter. I do not want to labour the issue by making a lengthy speech. However, considerable anxiety has been expressed in Scotland about the apparent lack of the kind of leadership over joint planning that has been shown south of the Border by the Department of Health and Social Security and the Welsh Office. It is felt that there has been an absence of concerted action across Scotland and an absence of the kind of consultation that involves voluntary groups — those who do so much valuable work for the disabled, the handicapped and the elderly — in a general and significant way. Clause 16 was added to the Bill in Committee in order to remedy that lack.

Depite the Minister's confidence about the way in which voluntary arrangements have been developed, although joint consultative committees are mandatory in England and Wales, Scotland has been left only with the National Health Service (Scotland) Act 1978 which contains the hope that health boards and local authorities will co-operate. However, it does not contain a statutory duty or provide for the kind of structured framework in which consultation takes place in other parts of the country.

The Scottish Office circular of 24 April 1985 has been widely seen to be inadequate by everybody, except the Minister. Paragraph 6 says:

"These plans"—

these are the joint plans—

"would in the first instance be for the guidance of the health board and the local authorities concerned; they need not be formally submitted to the Secretary of State, and will not require his approval, although it would be helpful if copies were sent to him."

That is a pretty "peelie wall" approach by the Minister. Representations have been made to me that there has been a certain slippage in expectations when measured against the expectations aroused by that circular.

I put down various written Questions which were very helpfully answered by the Minister in anticipation of this debate. On the preparation of plans, he was able to say that only Shetland and Orkney health boards had prepared the plans requested and that health boards were not required formally to submit copies of their plans to the Secretary of State. However, Shetland health board has sent a copy of its plan, which covers all four priority groups, to the Scottish Home and Health Department. All credit to Shetland, and all credit to Orkney. However, the Minister has been unable to say anything about the rest of Scotland. Important though the islands are, a great deal of Scotland lies outside Orkney and Shetland.

That underlines the point that I am making. The Minister said in another answer that the Government have no reason to believe that the joint planning and liaison committees are not following the guidance set out in the April 1985 circular. The Minister may not have any reason to believe that they are not but neither is he in a position to say that they are. That is a weakness in an area in which there has been, over a period of time, a good deal of anxiety about the lack of progress and lack of involvement especially of the voluntary groups.

In the last minutes of the Report stage I do not wish to be churlish about the Minister's efforts. I have read the reports on the debate in Committee on 5 February 1986. Acceptance of new clause 12 was urged by my hon. Friend the Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson). I read the speech of the Parliamentary Under-Secretary and he appeared to be a little bit complacent about what was happening. He discussed the circular which gave the whole process a fresh impetus. He went on to say:

"We risk penalising local authorities and health boards which have made real progress, and we risk delaying worthwhile processes which we have worked long and hard to promote."

The Minister now seeks to remove that clause. Later on in the speech the Minister said:

"I hope that the Committee will not put the clock back," [Official Report, Standing Committee C; 5 February 1986, c. 50.]

That raised a lot of hackles among the voluntary groups. It came as a surprise to many people in the local authorities and those who are involved in social work. To give statutory impetus to a process which we all agree is an admirable one—the importance of joint planning—is not a matter of dispute between sides. I cannot see that giving joint planning a statutory basis can be described, fairly, as putting the clock back.

I am grateful for the fact that the Minister, not just because of pressure from the House but from groups in Scotland, is prepared to think again and has come a good way towards meeting our points. It is a simple proposition which holds up well in logic and in terms of its administration. If the Minister is correct we do not need a statutory basis. There is, however, no harm in having such a basis. It will reassure people. It will give an edge to joint consultative efforts and will involve the widest possible spectrum of expert opinion.

The Minister is maybe being over optimistic and perhaps some advice which is reaching Members is more accurate. It seems that there is a clear case for giving statutory force to the joint planning and consultation processes in Scotland parallel to what is happening South of the Border. Although we are not getting everything, I welcome the fact that some gestures have been made.

I recognise the Minister's point on the necessity to extend the process to cover the four priority groupings —the physically and mentally handicapped through to the elderly.

My hon. Friend the Member for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke) has fought long and hard and with great tactical skill for the Bill. He is happy to accept what is being offered by the Minister. I do not wish in any way to cavil with what he has said and we will certainly watch what happens over the next two years with great care. We hope that the Minister's monitoring of the planning process by means of the circular is positive monitoring. I hope that he will not hesitate to use his powers under the enabling clauses which will be written in another place. That is necessary. The Minister's powers should not be left to lie upon the shelf unused. If there is a need, I hope that the Minister will not hesitate to act.

If it is not uncharitable I shall end on a warning, if not a slightly threatening, note. Whatever monitoring is pursued by the Minister — we shall certainly try to monitor what will happen — there will be groups in every constituency in Scotland who will make sure that the House will not forget about the issue. If we do not make the progress which I believe the importance of the matter deserves we shall be knocking very hard at the Minister's door to remind him of the enabling powers which will be written into the Bill.

Mr. Gordon Wilson (Dundee, East): I welcome the concessions that the Minister has made. At the outset, many people feared that the Government were sticking their heels in and were unprepared to make concessions. Many people in Scotland in caring organisations were keen that the statutory approach and joint planning should be adopted.

The Scottish working group, composed of 22 organisations, wrote to Scottish Members of Parliament, drawing attention to its fear that the Scottish Office, which, to its credit, has been in the lead in some aspects of care for the disabled, has been lagging behind. I am glad that the Minister has said that he will produce a new clause and alter the long title to deal with the elderly. I should like to thank him for that.

In these circumstances, it is better to be gracious. I know that that is extremely difficult, but those of us who have a proper Christian background are prepared to express gratitude on the Floor of the House occasionally for a sinner come to repentance. That is a rare event for Scottish Office Ministers.

I should like to thank my hon. Friend the Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) for keeping me informed of progress. I welcome the concessions.

1.41 pm

Mr. Tom Clarke: I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

The months since early November, when I came first in the ballot, have been incredible but very inspiring. I have learnt a great deal, not least from the Government Front Bench. I hope that it might occasionally admit that it was able to learn something from us. Perhaps more important, we have been able to reach agreement on what I think can be a good and effective Bill which is in the interests of 5·5 million disabled people.

I have to be candid, however. The Bill is not as radical as the Standing Committee would have wished or as I would have hoped, but we are building for the future. The input of disabled people, voluntary organisations and professional bodies into the Bill has been outstanding. There are many people whom I ought to thank. For that very reason, it would be very difficult. I should like, however, to put on record my deep appreciation to Mr. John Healey, Mr. Peter Mitchell and Mr. Hugh Stewart, among others, who have done sterling work in support of the Bill.

I thank right hon. and hon. Members on both sides of the House, especially my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe (Mr. Morris), whose great interest and experience in these matters has been invaluable. My hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) referred to our unique arrangements for whipping. When we next have a meeting of the Scottish Grand Committee I am sure that the hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) will be happy to offer his services and that we will be all the better for them. We all appreciate the work that he has done.

We have reached that stage at which we can contemplate what the exercise has achieved thus far. We have had an open and wide-ranging debate, which has involved the public. Some sections of the media have been excellent and others have perhaps been a little disappointing. As time passes those who have been disappointed will perhaps realise the importance of the Bill. We have ensured that a number of vital issues have been considered, such as representation, assessment, the problems of school leavers and the 19-plus problems. We have deliberated also on discharge from psychiatric hospitals and the Scottish planning clause. We have made considerable progress and I do not believe that the House would want to underestimate its scope.

Time after time Government spokesmen have referred to resource implications. The House has reached a conclusion on the matters contained in the Bill after serious consideration. In due course we shall hear the views of those in another place. When we come to that stage and when we reflect in this place on what has been said by their Lordships, perhaps my hon. Friend the Member for Fulham (Mr. Raynsford), who has a great deal of expertise in many of the matters covered by the Bill, will join in our discussions. I am sure that his contribution will be welcome.

I say in all candour and without, I hope, causing any offence, especially to the Minister for Health, that the Treasury should remember that it is responsible to this place and not the reverse. This place has established priorities for the disabled and mentally handicapped and their carers. We have taken the decision. We could consider it ill-judged if the Treasury took the view that it should try to thwart the decisions and objectives of the House when the Bill is duly enacted.

I thank my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition for his interest and support. I think that his intervention yesterday was crucial. We have reached the stage when I must express the hope that the Bill will be given its Third Reading. I hope that in time it will be developed to provide a framework for the real progress that I think the disabled will welcome. We have not yet achieved such a framework but the disabled certainly deserve one. I look forward to the time when the many problems the disabled are facing will be solved and when the disabled will feel that they have an enormous contribution to make to our society and the potential which the House wishes them to realise.

Mr. Hayhoe: First, I congratulate warmly the hon. Member for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke) on what he has achieved. I made it clear throughout that the Government endorse the principles that the Bill seeks to enshrine. On Second Reading, I said:

> "I hope that the hon. Member for Monklands, West and his sponsors will be prepared to respond constructively to amendments, some perhaps radical and substantial, which the Government will bring forward. If they do, it is likely that at the end of the day they will be responsible for a Bill which provides a useful if modest development of the present legislative basis on which services are provided for disabled people. That is a worthy achievement for any Member of this place."—[Official Report, 17 January 1986; Vol. 89, c. 1372.]

That is the worthy achievement which the hon. Member for Monklands, West is getting close to chalking up today. We now have a measure that will genuinely help to improve services for the disabled without imposing inflexible and impracticable burdens upon local authorities. That is what the Government always hoped would emerge.

The Bill represents an important development of existing provision for the disabled and as such it has significant cost implications. As I have explained, the Government will make commencement orders to bring into effect those of the Bill's provisions which have significant resource implications when the necessary resources are available. Other provisions without significant cost will, I hope, be brought into effect soon after Royal Assent.

We have had a good and constructive debate and not at all the debate that was predicted by those in the media and elsewhere who were questioning the Government's attitudes and intentions and, as they so often do, making wholly and utterly wrong predictions.

The debate has been characterised by the constructive nature of the points raised on both sides of the House. I can assure the House that the Government have noted all the points and many of them reflect issues which were raised during the consultation exercise. We shall be seeking to take them into account in the further consultation and co-operation with the hon. Member for Monklands, West and his hon. Friends following Third Reading when looking at some of the points which have been highlighted and identified during our discussions of amendments which should properly be brought in with the agreement of another place. I must make it clear that such amendments in another place must be on the understanding that they are acceptable to the Government and if they do not add further to the cost of the Bill.

It is fair to say that this is something of a historic day in the development of the legislative structure for the provision of services for disabled people. The hon. Member for Monklands, West rightly and properly paid tribute to some of his advisers from the voluntary sector who, I know, worked closely with my officials on many of the detailed matters concerning this legislation. The hon. Gentleman has steered his Bill with considerable skill, great moderation, great patience and realism of what can be achieved within the constraints, which necessarily control us all, and with consideration for hon. Members in other parts of the House so as to achieve the widest possible area of agreement.

I hope that by praising him in this way I do not influence his reselection, which I hope has been well established by now. At any rate, this achievement, as I have said, is one of which any hon. Member can be proud. Of course, the hon. Gentleman is not yet quite home, as he well recognises. The Bill has to go to another place. If the other place and those responsible for the Bill there have the same skill, moderation, realism, patience and consideration which the hon. Gentleman has shown I see no reason why the Bill should not become law and receive Royal Assent. I say to the hon. Gentleman, as one has sown, so has one reaped. If the response to what I said on Second Reading had not been constructive, realistic and responsible we would not all be congratulating each other. We would probably be jumping up and down with points of order. I am sure that the reason for the presence of the distinguished Leader of the Opposition is to add to the congratulations to his hon. Friend rather than to take advantage of what might have been a rather different situation.

I have no wish to end in any other way than again to congratulate the hon. Gentleman. I have made my gratitude to him clear all along for the courtesy and consideration with which all the dealings we have had together have been carried through. I wish the Bill well.

Mr. Wigley I shall give up the self-denying ordinance that I have exercised today to congratulate the hon. Member for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke) on his great achievement in steering this Bill through to Third Reading, not entirely undented but 70 per cent. to 80 per cent. complete. I thank the hon. Gentleman for the decision that he took after coming top of the ballot, to pick up the Bill. There were pressures on him to go in other directions, but he chose the Bill that would do the most good to the most people. He has built up the Bill through Committee and on Report to something that is really worth while.

Many people have helped in getting the Bill through the House. I should like to thank not least those who have been able to come to the Chamber today. There are more people here than there usually are on a Friday. It has not been necessary to divide the House, which is a satisfactory state of affairs, but it was good to see the support of all parties across the House on these important issues. It is good to see the Leader of the Opposition here. I am not sure how much sleep he has had, but no doubt he has had a good celebration. That underlines the importance of these issues.

Reference has been made to those who have worked hard, such as John Healey and Peter Mitchell, as well as organisations that have given support, especially MENCAP, the Spastics Society, the Scottish organisations, and the Standing Committee of Voluntary Organisations in Wales.

There are important elements in the Bill as it goes forward to the other place, giving representation to those who are incapable of speaking up on their own behalf because of disability. We now have a structure that will enable them to have their case properly heard, and proper assessment and non-bureaucratic and efficient procedures to facilitate that.

Progress has been made today on the position of those leaving special schools. I thank the Government for being willing to accept the new clause tabled by the hon. Member for Monklands, West, so that those leaving special schools, will have an assessment before going out into the community. The same will apply to those leaving long-stay hospitals. Those two areas are critical for disabled people and their families. I welcome the approach that the Government have taken today and the commitment that the Ministers have given. I thank all three Ministers for their willingness to meet deputations and discuss these matters. We have not always seen entirely eye to eye in everything, but one never does. The way in which Ministers have responded has been a significant step forward.

The one area in which we have not been able to go as far as we would like is on carers. I hope that the other place will consider what can be done within the resource limitations and that we shall look again at the matter in future months and years, while doing everything that we can. If there is any one group of people who deserve support, it is those who look after disabled people, especially women, who have given up their careers to look after members of the family or others who are disabled.

With regard to resources, the Government said that, according to their own discussion paper, there was a financial implication of between £25 million and £100 million. That is what they were advised. They have grasped the nettle. I hope that that money will become available to turn the legislation into reality. The provisions will have to be phased in, but I hope that the elements that imply expenditure commitments are not left so long as to leave those who are looking forward to their enactment hanging on while there is nothing happening. I realise that some things cannot happen this year. There may be a need to provide money for local authorities, particularly in the next financal year. I hope that there will not be an undue delay beyond that.

Today, a very important Bill is going from this House to another place. I hope that it will be treated constructively there, and that after it comes back here later in the Session it will be on the statute book before too long.

1.53 pm

Mrs. Kellett-Bowman: I have refrained from speaking on the Bill, apart from a brief intervention, because, as someone with a lifelong interest in the disabled, I should have been horrifed if I had been instrumental in talking out the Bill. I have sat here through virtually all the proceedings because I believe that the Bill is extremely important. As my right hon. Friend the Minister for Health said, this is a historic day in the development of services for disabled people.

I have the honour to represent a city with a long tradition of hospital service. Many of the matters that are dealt with in the Bill will set at rest the anxieties of many of my constituents. They will be glad to know that the gap in the education facilities for young people will, to a large extent, be filled by the Bill. They will be relieved to know that people leaving long-stay hospitals, two of which are in my constituency, will, from now, be assessed properly before they leave, and all the services will be co-ordinated before they are released into the community.

We are fortunate in our local hospitals in that nobody is released into the community without the hospital ensuring that proper services are available for them, and we want to make sure that the high standards that we practise are common throughout the country.

I congratulate the hon. Member for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke) on his enterprise in getting the Bill through and my right hon. Friend the Minister on working so closely with his colleagues in getting the Bill through in an atmosphere of harmony and tremendously positive achievement. I cannot recall in many years a Bill that has given me greater pleasure, and I thank everybody for co-operating in it.

2 pm

Mr. Alfred Morris: Our proceedings on the Bill have been full of surprises. Many strange things have happened. We thought that the Minister for Health had been put in as a night watchman. If that was the original intention, he has played a very long innings. He has been patient and understanding and, although he has not been as helpful as we had wished, we forgive him as the Bill has now reached Third Reading.

Another strange thing is that we had today the maiden speech on the Bill of the Minister for the Disabled. He emerged from the dressing room this morning full of running and we welcomed him to the Dispatch Box. We know that he is involved in other legislation, and I am glad that he agrees that this Bill is deeply important for Britain's 5·5 million disabled people, their families and all who care for them.

There were two schools of thought about when to congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke). There were those who congratulated him at the beginning of today's proceedings. I thought it safer to wait for the Third Reading as there were some uncertainties this morning about the final outcome. My hon. Friend has been dour——

Mr. Tom Clarke: It is pronounced "doer".

Mr. Morris: ——good-humoured, responsive to all possible offers of help and always felicitous in his use, if not his pronunciation, of words.

It is now virtually an annual custom for the House to debate one or more private Members' Bills on the needs of Britain's disabled people and their families. Yet it is not by any means an old custom. Before the Chronically Sick and Disabled Persons Act 1970, there were entire Parliaments in which the claims and needs of disabled people and their families were never debated. It seems unbelievable and outrageous now, but in the Parliament of 1959-64 there was not one debate in the House of Commons on disability. Going further back, there was not a single mention between 1945 and 1959 in the manifestos of either of the main political parties of anything that might be done specifically to help people with disabilities. In congratulating my hon. Friend the Member for Monklands, West on his choice of Bill, I also most warmly thank him for strongly maintaining this important new tradition of the House.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Stoke-on-Trent, South (Mr. Ashley) has played a most distinguished part in our proceedings. He speaks as chairman of the all-party disablement group. He raised this morning, on new clause 9, an important point about interpreters for deaf people. I hope that what he said will be considered very carefully and sympathetically in the other place. Speaking for the Opposition, we shall be glad if the other place wants to strengthen the Bill. I was saying this morning that many of the Government's proposals offered only 80 per cent. of what we sought, so if the other place wants to go a little further we will look very sympathetically at its proposals.

To use the word "resources" in Committee was like swearing in church. It seems to have been rather less reprehensible to use it on Report. I must, of course, emphasise that the Bill has resource implications. What we must now ensure, in partnership with the local authority associations, is that the resources required by the Bill are made available in addition to those now at the disposal of local government. Unless that happens, the Bill will not achieve its purpose.

As the World Charter for disabled people says, they have the same rights as all mankind to grow and to learn, to work and to create, to love and to be loved. This humane and important Bill will take disabled people much further along the road to the full attainment of that important objective. I am delighted that my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition is with us today. He has helped enormously in sustaining our efforts to enact the Bill. I understand that we meet in the presence of a very distinguished visitor. My right hon. Friend has spent much of this morning with him.

I thank also all hon. and right hon. Members on both sides of the House who have helped to press forward an objective that is so important to many of the most needful people in Britain today. Bless 'em all.

2.7 pm

Mr. Rowe: I am one of those who reserved my congratulations to the hon. Member for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke) until Third Reading. Even if I had not kissed the blarney stone—or, given the English background of my right hon. Friend the Minister for Health, perhaps I should say the Barney stone—I would like to say just how admirably the hon. Member for Monklands, West has dealt with his Bill.

It is particularly gratifying for a Conservative Member to have played a small part in helping to put a Bill on the statute book that takes us one step further away from the paternalism which has been the key note — despite, perhaps, the best of intentions—of how we have dealt with the problems of the handicapped. Somehow, we have always assumed that the authorities know best, but one of the great things about the Bill is that it states beyond peradventure that the person who is most likely to have a valuable idea about how he can best be looked after is the person who requires the help on offer. Indeed, the representation provisions in the Bill are unbelievably important for that reason alone.

The Bill marks a return to a concept which was once more common but which has been gradually undermined: we all have a responsibility to those who are disabled or ill. The tendency to shut away people who are mentally handicapped or ill, or who have a severe disability, so that none of us can see them or be troubled by their difficulties must be reversed. The Bill goes a long way towards doing that.

There is work for us to do. In our debate on the carers, my right hon. Friend the Minister made a very important point. He said that if we can show that the Government's estimates of what the full implications of the Bill will cost were wrong and our estimates that it would be much cheaper were right, the Government would seriously consider changing its attitude. This means that everyone interested in further progress under this legislation should work to provide as accurate an estimate as possible of the savings that can be extracted from the care of the carers and from the early assessment of need, so that we can go to the Treasury and say that our estimates are better and more optimistic than the Treasury's estimates and that it should honour the pledge given by the Minister. That is an obligation on the voluntary organisations which played such a great part in getting this Bill through, and on parliamentarians who want further progress to be made. I pledge myself to play my part in that.

Mr. Ashley: I add my tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke). Perhaps the best tribute I can pay to him is to say that he has conducted the Bill as we expected him to do. Other people responsible for the passage of the Bill deserve my special tribute. Of these, two have already been mentioned—Peter Mitchell and John Healey. Without their expertise the Bill would never have made progress. I pay a warm tribute to those two people from the back room.

Other people have been active in the all-party disablement group. The hon. Member for Exeter (Mr. Hannam) could not be here today, but he has worked marvellously well in this House year in and year out, often behind the scenes, for disabled people. The other member of the all-party disablement group to whom I refer is the hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley). On this Bill, he has been the unofficial Whip. I see that our Chief Whip is listening carefully. The unofficial Whip had an important role to play. Without the work of those people, the Bill could not have progressed this far.

The Leader of the Opposition is preoccupied today; he is on a high. However, I am anxious to avoid making any party political point. Ministers might not like this, but they should recognise that without the intervention of the Leader of the Opposition we would not have got the Bill today. I do not want to make heavy weather out of this, but it is a fact. Despite what the Minister has said, I point out that ordinary plodding mortals can inform the Leader of the Opposition of facts about disability, but he transmutes them into political gold. His intervention yesterday was magnificent and most influential. I put that on record because of what the Minister said when speaking to clause 9. He said, "I must be honest with the House." All I am doing now is being honest with the House. I thank the Leader of the Opposition for the important role he has played in ensuring the passage of this significant Bill for disabled people.

I now want to pay a tribute to the disabled people themselves. It is by their effort and growing articulation and insistence on their voice being heard that the Bill will reach the statute book. Nobody who is not disabled realises what severely disabled people go through. Only they and their families realise the extent of the deprivation of the pleasures of life. Only they know the appalling loneliness of disability and how much effort it takes if one is disabled. So it is to those people that I pay tribute today.

Finally, we appreciate what the Government have done, and, I do not want them to misunderstand that. However, the Bill's implementation worries me. We want the Government to implement the Bill as soon as it is passed. If it is not implemented, they will receive the credit for the measure but will not have to find the wherewithal for it. I assume that they will implement the Bill as soon as it reaches the statute book. If they do so, it will transform the lives of millions of disabled people.

2.15 pm

Mr. Kennedy: Considering the healthy turn-out on this Bench one can say that the Bill gives all sections of the House a cause for celebration today. I add my thanks and congratulations to the hon. Member for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke). All those who have participated in this morning's debate will agree that the constructive spirit of co-operation on the issues and priorities which affect the disabled sector has shown the House, particularly those interested in this issue, in an extremely good light.

The Bill gives prominence to the ability and access of the disabled to enjoy the advocacy and the assessment of the needs and issues which confront them; gives priority to care in the community; and emphasises the role of the carers. The Bill is indeed welcome, and we hope that it will have a good and speedy passage in the other place. I echo the words of the right hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, South (Mr. Ashley) in saying that we hope its implementation will be as swift as possible.

Obviously, any society and Parliament which devotes attention, to the needs of one of the most vulnerable sections of the community, and one of the sections most in need of parliamentary political support, is behaving well and doing its job well. The Bill has enabled us to do that. We all congratulate the hon. Member for Monklands, West and his colleagues who have worked so hard to make that a reality today, and we thank the Government for their constructive approach.

2.17 pm

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): The Bill is extremely important, and I congratulate the Government on the way in which they have managed to help it pass through the House after a great deal of acrimonious debate. I congratulate the hon. Member for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke) who has fought so ably and courageously for the interests of the disabled. I particularly wanted to make that comment because there has been a lot of acrimony about the Bill. Due recognition should be given to the role the Government played in ensuring that the Bill reaches the statute book.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read the Third time, and passed.

Drainage Rates (Disabled Persons) Bill

Considered in Committee; reported, without amendment.

2.20 pm

Sir Gerard Vaughan (Reading, East): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the Third Time.

The House will appreciate that if it accepts the Bill, we shall have passed two measures today which will help disabled people. The Bill is a small step to correct an error in the Rating (Disabled Persons) Act 1978. Under that Act, it was possible for disabled people to have rebates of their rates, but they were unable to have rebates on their drainage rates. Most people pay a general rate and a water rate, but a few people living in areas such as the Fens and around the rivers Ouse and Severn also pay a drainage rate. Inadvertently, under the 1978 Act those disabled people were prevented from receiving rebates of their drainage rates. The Bill will enable those few hundred people to make claims on those rates.

Under the Bill, the rating authority will make a written note to the internal drainage board that it has allowed a rebate on the general rate to some disabled people. The drainage board will then be allowed to give a rebate to those people. It will also be possible for institutions occupied by disabled people to claim rebates. That would cover the provision of additional lavatories, bathrooms and garages and, in some cases, heating allowances, which are required by groups of disabled people.

I hope that the House will regard the Bill as a small measure correcting an error in a previous Act and as a measure of justice to some disabled people.

2 22 pm

The Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. Michael Jopling): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Reading, East (Sir G. Vaughan) on his success in the ballot and on his wisdom in choosing this subject for his Bill. Many hon. Members will agree that if an hon. Member is fortunate in the ballot but secures only a modest position, there is always a dilemma about what he should do for the best. He has the option of introducing some great measure of national or world-beating, epoch-making calibre which might sometimes be hugely controversial and which comes to an early end through the use of the procedures of the House and no one hears of the measure again. Alternatively, he could try to find a modest measure that is useful, helpful and necessary. My hon. Friend has adopted the latter course.

My hon. Friend is in good company. I was once in a similar position. In the 1960s, I introduced the Parish Councils and Burial Authorities (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act. I do not know whether it is still on the statute book. I suspect that it has been overtaken by other measures.

The Government welcome the Bill. I am grateful to those hon. Members who have eased the Bill's passage so that it can go on to the other place. I intend to give what help I can to ensure that this small but worthwhile Bill reaches the statute book.

The Bill restores to disabled persons relief from drainage rates which was unintentionally removed by the Rating (Disabled Persons) Act 1978. The hon. Member who introduced that Bill is not present, so I shall not name him. I am satisfied that the omission of that provision was unintentional.

Relief from general rates and special drainage rates payable in areas covered by internal drainage boards was provided by adjustments in the rateable value of properties occupied by disabled persons. The 1978 legislation abolished that system in favour of rebates on general rates, but overlooked similar provisions for drainage rates. The Bill rectifies the position by providing relief on drainage rates in proportion to the rebates on general rates. The sums involved are likely to be small, but we believe that this opportunity should be taken to right an injustice that was inadvertently imposed on the disabled.

We have been reviewing the arrangements for the administration and finance of land drainage and flood defences. The Government are considering the responses to the Green Paper in the light of proposals for water authority privatisation, but final decisions are not likely for some time. The Government's proposals for reform of the general rating system which were announced in the Green Paper "Paying for Local Government" are likely to take some time to be realised. In the meantime, I ask for all-party support, which was given to the Rating (Disabled Persons) Act 1979, so that this legislation is placed on the statute book.

The guts of the Bill are in clause 1, which requires rating authorities which have granted a rebate under the Rating (Disabled Persons) Act 1978 on a hereditament in an internal drainage district to give the internal drainage board written notice of that rebate. The written notice would state the gross amount of the general rate and the rebate, the hereditament to which it related and the period for which the rebate had been granted. On receipt of that notice, the internal drainage board would grant corresponding relief in respect of any drainage rates chargeable in connection with that hereditament by reducing the drainage rates payable or by repaying any amount that happened to be overpaid.

I have explained to the House how this works. I hope that very soon we shall hear from another place that this matter has been agreed there and that the Bill may appear on the statute book. All hon. Members will want to join me in congratulating my hon. Friend the Member for Reading, East upon the signal service that he has again performed in his long parliamentary life on behalf of the disabled people of this country.

Freedom of Speech

Motion made, and Question proposed, that this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Sainsbury.]

2.33 pm

Mr. John Carlisle (Luton, North): My hon. Friend the Minister will not be surprised if I begin my remarks on this very important subject of freedom of speech within universities and colleges of further education in the same way as my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Withington (Mr. Silvester) began his speech to the House on 11 February when he introduced his Freedom of Speech (Universities and Institutions of Higher Education) Bill. He said:

"The Bill should not be necessary and it is sad that it is." —[Official Report, 11 February 1986; Vol. 91, c. 795.]

This debate would be unnecessary but for recent events on university campuses, and outside, and the attacks suffered by right hon. and hon. Members of this House and other persons.

Those events, and the discussions which followed, have put some pressure on the vice-chancellors of our universities and the principals of colleges of further education to try to put their houses in order. I have sought this debate to ask the House to reconsider the report of the vice-chancellors and to learn the reaction of my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Science and, indeed, the views of the Secretary of State.

No one would deny the principle of freedom of speech —it is a freedom contained in law. Few would wish to deny that right, especially at seats of academic learning. The whole process of teaching at university or school concerns the acquisition of knowledge.

The tragedy of recent events is that, of all places, it is at universities and colleges—places of knowledge and learning—that freedom of speech has been denied to certain people. I was disturbed by the remarks of the president of the National Union of Students, Mr. Phil Woolas, concerning my experiences at Bradford. He justified the actions of those who attacked me on the basis of the provocative nature of my speech. I remind the House that, on that occasion, I was not even allowed to say anything because the mob prevented me from doing so. The comments of the president of the NUS are worrying to hon. Members and to members of universities and colleges of further education.

In the past few years, various student unions have passed a no-platform policy. It is a policy whereby visiting speakers are denied the opportunity to address members of the university or members of associations or clubs in the university because of the views that they hold. The unions have adopted this policy on the basis, in some way, of ensouraging the anti-apartheid and anti-racist movements. It is a disturbing procedure and one that should be deplored.

It is gratifying to learn that certain universities and colleges have rescinded the no-platform policy. Oxford and Cambridge—I had trouble at both universities—have now reversed their no-platform policies. That is encouraging. However, the policy exists at certain universities, notably at York. A High Court case is pending against its student union because of this policy. It also exists at Sheffield and at the university of East Anglia.

That is the dark side of the problem but it is encouraging that other universities such as Swansea, Manchester and Lancaster have voted against such a policy. This sorry, sad affair and the attacks that have taken place on hon. Members and other people bring home the fact that students, who are seeking financial support from the House and the Government, are prejudicing their case by the way they treat visiting speakers. There are two sides to the problem. There are the acts preventing visiting speakers from addressing university audiences and actions against members of universities, especially members of the Federation of Conservative Students.

I do not wish to detain the House with a sorry catalogue of the experiences of hon. Members and others. However, for the sake of the record it is right that they should be related to the House. At Manchester university my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Brittan) and my right hon. Friend the Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine) were attacked and in one case sprayed with red paint. More notably, my hon. and learned Friend the Minister of State, Home office was attacked while attempting to address a meeting and was prevented from speaking. At Nottingham university, the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Energy my hon. Friend the Member for Wirral, West (Mr. Hunt) was prevented from speaking. My right hon. Friend the Member for Chingford (Mr. Tebbit), the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, was prevented from speaking at the same university. At Warwick university, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science was prevented from speaking. At Bristol and Bradford universities, my hon. Friend the Member for Billericay (Mr. Proctor) was prevented from speaking. At Kingston polytechnic, my right hon. Friend the Member for Hertsmere (Mr. Parkinson) was prevented from speaking. At Guildford college of law, my hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor-General had his meeting cancelled. At Sussex university, the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen) was pelted with fruit and eggs. More recently, I was subjected to physical attack at Bradford university and was prevented from speaking at Oxford university. My hon. Friend the Member for Darlington (Mr. Fallon) was punched in the face in the students union bar after addressing a meeting at Sunderland polytechnic. Perhaps most sinister of all, Professor John Vincent, a lecturer at Bristol university, had his lectures picketed and burst into by an angry mob to the extent that he suffered a great deal of personal harassment.

Those are small examples of what is happening. There are others which do not receive the same publicity. My hon. Friend the Minister will, therefore, have some idea of the physical intimidation that is occurring at universities and colleges of further education. Visiting speakers are being prevented from putting their views.

The reaction in the House has been predictable. No fewer than 54 of my hon. Friends have signed early-day motion 582, which was tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Withington and which deplores the actions of the hooligans. Perhaps as relevant is the fact that three Opposition Members have seen fit to attack that early-day motion and to table an amendment supporting the students who, it says,

"have sought to protect their compuses from fascists, racists and apartheid fellow travellers."

Some Opposition Members clearly support the violence on some of our campuses.

Members of the Federation of Conservative Students and members of Conservative associations are also suffering. At the polytechnic of North London, the FCS has been banned from operating freely by the students union. At the Thames polytechnic, no recruitment stall was permitted at freshers evening unless the Tory club, the existence of which the student union refuses to acknowledge, paid a £500 fee by return of post.

At the North Staffordshire polytechnic, the local Conservative party agent was expelled from the student union-controlled recruitment fair under threat of physical violence. At Leicester polytechnic, a FCS vice-chairman was attacked and threatened by a large crowd. At Manchester polytechnic, a recruitment fair stall was overturned and the FCS chairman was punched in the face. At the University of East Anglia the student union withdrew the Conservative Association's funds because of my impending visit.

The main thrust of those who oppose the principle of freedom of speech is severe physical intimidation of the FCS and others interested in the Conservative movement. Meetings with speakers that they hoped to hold are being forced off campus. At various universities and colleges, recruitment for Conservative Associations is being prevented and legitimate funds to those associations are being blocked by student unions and other bodies. Those who attend meetings for visiting speakers of whatever political hue run the risk of some physical intimidation or attack. I have been lucky enough in recent times to receive full police protection at some meetings, but all those who want to attend the meetings do not get the same protection that I and other hon. Members enjoy.

The offenders throughout this long and sorry saga are almost all members of what Paul Johnson in the Spectator described as the "Fascist Left in action." He wrote:

"Their clear aim is to prevent, by force and terror, the expression of opinions."

The methods that they use are ugly and violent and are employed in the name of various organisations, including the various dissident groups. In every instance those involved are from the far Left. They are members of the Socialist Workers' party and the Labour party students' organisation, and in many instances they are members of the Militant organisation. There is a somewhat sinister parallel between the activities of this group and the activities of the members of the Nazi party in Germany during the 1920s. We know that the Nazi party tried to influence students and infiltrate student organisations, and that tactic had the disastrous consequences of which we are all aware. The recent opinion poll which expressed the amount of support for the Conservative party being as low as it is reflects, perhaps, the success of the tactics of the Fascist Left.

The Committee of Vice-Chancellors and Principals issued guidelines to its members and other interested parties on 13 December 1985. It did so on the basis of freedom of speech and lawful assembly. It was that which among other things led to this Adjournment debate. There is no doubt that the guidelines contain some fine words and thoughts. There is a reference to the "unequivocal . . . support" of the Vice-Chancellors for the freedom of expression. It talks about the special responsibilities that universities have to provide a platform for speakers of any political colour and the "right to maintain good order on their premises". It refers rightly to protecting the rightful freedom of visiting speakers to go to universities and of the members of those universities to hear what they have to say.

I am concerned that the document sets out a rather jellied approach to those who are described as controversial speakers. The guidelines state:

"there may be cases of very high risk when universities may have to use their right of refusing permission for the holding of violently controversial meetings in university premises".

That would seem to provide a get-out to vice-chancellors and principals. If they are disturbed by the problems that could occur when certain speakers attend meetings, they have the get-out of being able to cancel the meetings. That has happened far too often to be an instance of vice-chancellors' policy which can be ignored. The guidelines were right and one supports them in principle. One certainly supports the principle of Professor Maurice Shock, who wrote the document in the first place, but the loophole which I have described gives the opportunity to certain principals at universities and colleges to cancel meetings because of fear of some trouble occurring. By cancelling meetings they are cancelling the freedom of speech which this Adjournment debate is all about.

The guidelines admit that in some universities security is inadequate. I accept that the last thing that we want to see is a large number of policemen on student campuses. However, we must acknowledge that where a police presence is necessary police officers should be called in.

There are various lines open to vice-chancellors and principals. First, if offences take place, the student union must be liable to fines. It is good to see that Warwick university was fined some time ago. Secondly, when students are convicted of criminal offences, as happened at a recent meeting in Leicester which I attended, they should be expelled from the university without further questions asked. Thirdly, trouble-makers should be isolated and vice-chancellors should be aware that they exist. Fourthly, I would recommend to vice-chancellors and principals that they should meet visiting speakers and, if need be, share the platform with them so that they can experience the violence that we, the visiting speakers, have to experience.

There are various options open to the Parliamentary Under-Secretary, the Secretary of State and Her Majesty's Government. The first is that we adopt the legislation proposed by my hon. Friend the Member for Withington which has the full support of Conservative Members. Secondly, the Secretary of State should seriously consider withdrawing funds, as he has the power to do, from those universities and colleges of further education which offend against the principle of free speech. Thirdly, I ask my right hon. Friend to look closely at the funding of the National Union of Students and student union bodies which, as my hon. Friends will know, exist on a closed shop basis. He should particularly look at the role of those who take a sabbatical year and who are, in many cases, those who are causing the most trouble. Fourthly, I say to the Parliamentary Under-Secretary and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State that we require a far stronger reaction when those offences occur. I think that it is imperative, which is why I intend to give my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary the opportunity this afternoon, to state firmly and clearly that hon. Members and others should have absolute and free access to universities and such places and be able to put their views forward, whatever they are, in the pursuit of academic learning. For that reason I shall look forward with interest to what my hon. Friend has to say.

2.52 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Science (Mr. George Walden): The issue raised by my hon. Friend this afternoon is of vital importance in a democratic society. Historically, this country has been a byword for freedom of speech in general and in its universities in particular—ask any refugee who came to Britain from Nazi Germany in the thirties. But then ask too how the whole situation in Germany began. I suspect that an important part of the answer will be the preference of some people with a liberal conscience for a quiet life.

I do not want to make extravagant comparisons. I am simply warning against complacency. The principles of free speech are indivisible in whatever place or time. Recent events of the kind to which my hon. Friend has referred remind us that there are present in any society —even our own—seeds of intolerance and intellectual thuggery, which can take root and flourish in ugly profusion if not weeded out in time.

My hon. Friend the Minister of State referred in a recent speech — and his reference has been extensively commented upon—to the risk of our schools helping to create a yob society. There is evidence of yobbishness seeping into higher education as well. Those may seem strong words, but the recent pattern of incidents is disturbing.

The Government are greatly concerned about protecting free speech, and about the number of occasions in recent months when it has been threatened. Invited speakers have faced disruption, violent behaviour, and personal assault on campuses. My hon. Friend is not alone in the House in having painful personal experience of this new climate of intolerance. The Government would like universities and other authorities to take firm action to ensure not only that the principle of freedom of speech is fully accepted, but that that principle is applied in practice. They therefore welcome the publication last December by the Committee of Vice-Chancellors and Principals of guidance on free speech and lawful assembly; and we are gratified to note that the Committee of Directors of Polytechnics is preparing similar guidance for its institutions.

When the CVCP guidance was issued, a good deal of publicity was given to one perhaps unfortunate paragraph which stated that "there may be cases of very high risk when universities may have to use their right of refusing permission for the holding of violently controversial meetings in university premises".

This was seen at the time as providing an easy escape route for institutions which might be willing to take the line of least resistance in order to avoid disruption. The point was taken up by the Government and discussed at a meeting with representatives of the Committee.

Shortly afterwards the chairman wrote to the Secretary of State to reiterate his committee's commitment to freedom of speech and to make it clear that the guidelines were never intended as, and should not be interpreted as providing a pretext for an institution to cancel a meeting other than in extreme circumstances.

I can do no better than quote from the chairman's letter, which unfortunately received less publicity than the original paragraph that gave rise to it. It said:

"legal advice and common sense dictated the need to cover circumstances in which a university, having consulted the police, might find itself unable to deal with the prospect of a major disturbance, possibly not provoked by its own students and involving few of them. The document as a whole and the careful phrasing of the passage in question should remove any doubt about where the universities stand on a matter of high principle in a free society. If any university were to surrender weakly to pressure it would not be able to find cover or protection by referring to the Committee's advice, but would rather find itself condemned."

The Government fully endorse the view expressed in the final sentence that I quoted. But that leads me to a deeper concern with a danger that may not yet be sufficiently recognised. The incidents so rightly deplored are merely what we see on the surface of things. In deploring them, we should be aware of a greater danger: the erosion of freedom of speech by default. It is regrettable that the guidelines contain no clear and specific suggestion that university authorities should ensure that speakers are not refused a platform by their student unions. Some recent incidents have been precipitated by those who have acted in defiance of a "no platform" policy. But who can measure the effects of such policies when they are not challenged? Such effects are essentially invisible: we do not know of those who have not been invited, we do not know of those who have been deterred by the threat of possible violence from seeking or agreeing to speak. There are no newspaper reports about debates that do not take place.

The refusal by minority groups of students of a platform on the grounds that particular individuals may be "racist" cannot be justified. When so used, the word "racist" often means little more than that an individual has previously expressed views that the student activists find objectionable. It may be, for example, that they dislike the policies of the South African Government; they are not alone in that. But that is not a justification, or even a sensible reason, for refusing freedom of speech. On the contrary, anyone who wishes to put an alternative view should be welcomed as a demonstration of the fact that in a free society anyone can say what he likes within the law, and so that his views can be exposed to the light of reason, humanity and democratic argument. To deny a platform is more than an attack on freedom of speech: it is a betrayal of the values on which a democracy depends.

The Government see it as vitally important that institutions should take a firm stand on such attempts to deny a platform to a speaker. The way on that has already been pointed by the University of York, which has shown itself willing to take legal action to prevent its student union insituting a "no platform" policy on the ground that such a policy would be inconsistent with the constitution of the student union under the charter and statutes of the university. The Government trust that other institutions will be similarly willing to take vigorous action to eliminate or prevent the introduction of no platform policies. In any instance where, at a particular time, a refusal cannot be prevented, it is to be hoped that the institution itself will consider offering a platform. When incidents occur and a decision to deal firmly with the offenders has been taken, the Government hope that institutions will not be deflected by insidious pressures, from whatever quarter.

I have concentrated so far on the responsibilities of the authorities of institutions in the protection of freedom of speech. But students, too, must accept that responsibility. I am well aware that many of the worst recent incidents have involved outside interlopers and that in some cases student unions were on the side of virtue. But equally there is no lack of evidence of misbehaviour by students. We all know where most of the trouble comes from, but this Government deplore irresponsible behaviour in whatever political quarter it arises.

Above all those who have sought and obtained positions of leadership in the student unions need to consider their position very carefully in this respect. Automatic membership of student unions in our higher education system is founded on a concept of responsible participation on the part of mature members of an academic community in the conduct of that community's affairs. That concept is brought into disrepute where confrontation is precipitated by "no platform" policies; where no lead is given in opposing undemocratic action or violence on campuses; where those who perpetrate it are protected by unions; where union leaders themselves refuse rational discussion with Ministers; and where a union's resources can be seen to be concentrated in favour of a limited range of interests.

We have stated in the past that although we have no present plans for reform of student unions, we sympathise with those who feel that reform may one day be necessary. With each instance where a student union is involved in the kind of threat to democratic values that we have seen too often recently, this sympathy grows. Those who claim to value the opportunities for personal development offered by the exercise of leadership in student unions would be well advised to consider this. If there continue to be others among them who show themselves unable or unwilling to exercise responsibility within the generally accepted constraints of a democratic society, there will be those in this House who will feel driven to conclude that unions should no longer have access to public funds. Some hon. Members have argued that the opportunity should be taken to insert in the current Education Bill a clause requiring higher education institutions to safeguard freedom of speech. The Government have rejected that approach on the grounds that the proposed clause would not effectively add to the protection of freedom of speech.

I naturally commend the characteristically rigourous and sincere effort that my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Withington (Mr. Silvester) made to move a Bill in this direction, and commend the spirit of the Bill, but he knows our view on the practice of introducing it at present.

It is futile to hope for a quiet life by, in effect, acquiescing in a ban on inconvenient outside speakers. The recent treatment of Professor Vincent by members of his own university shows that the canker of violence spreads quickly, and can erupt within our institutions and threaten academic freedom. If our society is to maintain its essential values all of us have a duty to be vigorous, unremitting and energetic in our defence of freedom.

Thomas Mann had more experience than most in these matters. In his passionate denunciation of demagogy and violence in his country in a speech called "The coming victory of democracy", he made this profound remark:

> "Because of its association and solidarity with knowledge, truth, justice, and as the opposite of violence and vulgarity, intellect becomes the advocate and representative of democracy on earth".

I hope that none of us lives to see the day when this passage can be quoted in reproach of any institute of learning in this country.

Question put and agreed to.

Oral Answers to Questions

National Coal Board

1. Mr. Neil Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Energy when he last met the chairman of the National Coal Board; and what matters were discussed.

The Secretary of State for Energy (Mr. Peter Walker): I meet the chairman of the National Coal Board regularly to discuss a wide range of issues concerning the coal industry.

Mr. Hamilton: I thank my right hon. Friend for that reply. Has he taken the opportunity recently to discuss with the chairman of the NCB the future of opencast mining and whether, in the context of the falls in oil prices recently, he feels it necessary to concentrate as much as possible on the lowest possible cost of output? Against that background, would it not be a good thing to remove the restrictions that apply to the small licensed operators in the private sector in conformity with the Monopolies and Mergers Commission's report three years ago? Why has the Department made no move in that direction during the ensuing period?

Mr. Walker: These matters are discussed with the NCB, which has to market the total production of coal. Mr. MacGregor has made no such suggestion to me.

Mr. Mason: Has the Secretary of State raised the issue of bad investment decisions by the NCB? Is he aware that in the area that I repesent vast sums were spent on modernising Redbrook colliery, both on the surface and underground, and that the work force of 1,800 is now fewer than 500 men? The future of the colliery is in doubt. Only six years ago the NCB invested £30 million in driving Kinsley drift, which was hailed as a wonder pit, but last week the NCB announced its closure. Is there no reason for an independent inquiry to be held into the investment decisions at those two pits and others in the coalfield, where vast sums have been lost to the British taxpayer?

Mr. Walker: If the right hon. Gentleman wants an independent inquiry, he should not confine it to the two pits to which he has referred. The inquiry should cover the entire industry and encompass other comparative forms of energy. He will find that when the previous Labour Government were in power—and they invested nowhere near as much as the present Government—many such decisions were taken.

Mr. Patrick McNair-Wilson: As lower oil prices will inevitably increase competition among world coal producers, and as Britain has the largest coal industry in the EEC, has the chairman given any indication of any moves to encourage sales, especially in Europe, where some currencies are now relatively stronger against sterling?

Mr. Walker: Yes, Sir. I know that the management of the NCB has taken an especial interest in improving its international marketing position. At present, competition with low-price oil is an embarrassment and a difficulty for coal industries thoroughout Europe, including our own. It is difficult to predict the future price of oil. I assure my hon. Friend that every consideration is being given by the NCB and the Government to the range of options before us.

Mr. Dormand: Does the Secretary of State agree that industrial relations in the mining industry are the worst they have been for many years and that this has been caused largely by the actions of the chairman of the NCB during and since the strike came to an end? Will he seek to hasten Mr. MacGregor's retirement, while realising that much more than that needs to be done? Will he, for example, have meetings with the full board of the NCB and stress that maximum efficiency will not be obtained until we achieve the goodwill of the miners?

Mr. Walker: I hope the hon. Gentleman recognises that productivity in the coal industry is far higher now than it has ever been since nationalisation. Therefore, there must be some appreciation of a management which has achieved productivity levels and given the industry a better chance of surviving and competing than ever before.

Mr. Robert B. Jones: Will my right hon. Friend now answer the question put to him by my hon. Friend the Member for Tatton (Mr. Hamilton) and say what discussions he will institute with the chairman of the National Coal Board about the Monopolies and Mergers Commission's report on opencast mining?

Mr. Walker: I am aware that a number of my hon. Friends have been lobbied by the opencast industry on this issue. I hope that the industry will recognise that coal marketing by the NCB is done in its totality and that 75 per cent. of coal in this country goes to the Central Electricity Generating Board. When seen in its total context, it might be that the package advocated by Ian MacGregor and the National Coal Board has some sanity and sense.

Mr. Hardy: Does the Secretary of State accept that the NCB could sell 6 million tonnes of coal to western Europe if western Europe was persuaded that it ought not to rely on dumped imports from outside the Community? Will he take the point expressed by the hon. Member for New Forest (Mr. McNair-Wilson) and ensure that far more vigour is used to secure that market for the British coal industry, in the light of the investment that the Government claim they have put into it?

Mr. Walker: It is true that the NCB has taken a great interest — far greater than ever before — in trying to establish export markets. It is not just imported coal that is the competition at present. The considerable lowering of the price of oil has created considerable difficulties.

Mr. Budgen: Is my right hon. Friend desirous of seeing all imports of coal excluded from this country and from all the countries of the EEC?

Mr. Walker: No, Sir.

Mr. Orme: When the Secretary of State talks about improved productivity in the mining industry, which we welcome, will he ensure that the fluctuations in oil prices are not used against the mining industry, certainly by the CEGB, as it is currently speculating? Secondly, may I reinforce the comments of my right hon. Friend the Member for Barnsley, Central (Mr. Mason) regarding the Kinsley drift mine and call for an independent inquiry?

Mr. Walker: Under the terms of the nationalisation of electricity, brought about by a Labour Government, the CEGB has a statutory duty to produce electricity at the most competitive and economic price. Therefore, if one criticises the CEGB for pursuing that objective, one is criticising the legislation originally passed by a Labour Government.

Energy Conservation

2. Mr. Patrick Thompson asked the Secretary of State for Energy what discussions he has had with the Association for the Conservation of Energy; and if he will make a statement.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Energy (Mr. David Hunt): My right hon. Friend and I have had a number of discussions with the chairman of the Association for the Conservation of Energy and much appreciate the association's contribution to Energy Efficiency Year.

Mr. Thompson: I am pleased that my hon. Friend has had regular discussions with the chairman in Energy Efficiency Year. Bearing in mind the £400 million that has been spent by the Government on helping people with their fuel costs, will he take urgent steps to find methods by which homes up and down the country can be insulated to higher standards so that we can improve warmth and cut costs in the future?

Mr. Hunt: I agree with my hon. Friend that it is important to do just that. That is why my right hon. Friend has substantially increased the number of voluntary insulation projects, which have now insulated over 150,000 homes, especially those of the elderly and disabled.

Mr. Wallace: Have the Secretary of State and the Minister had the opportunity to discuss with the Association for the Conservation of Energy the success of the schemes in Northern Ireland, where there is a 30 per cent. grant for companies investing in energy efficiency measures? Has he had any representations about extending that scheme to other parts of the United Kingdom?

Mr. Hunt: I had an opportunity of talking to the ACE seminar on insulation in Portsmouth last Tuesday, but the matter was not raised with me on that occasion. However, I shall look into it further.

Mr. Gerald Howarth: Is my hon. Friend aware that such has been the success of the Association for the Conservation of Energy that it has been invited by the Government of Canada to see whether it is possible to institute such a scheme in that country?

Mr. Hunt: My hon. Friend is right to stress the importance of ACE. The association and its members have been extremely enthusiastic in supporting Energy Efficiency Year.

Mr. Rowlands: Is not the association also the strongest advocate of placing specific duties on the gas and electricity industries in relation to energy conservation? Why have the Government repeatedly refused to consider that constructive and sensible set of proposals?

Mr. Hunt: The hon. Gentleman has overlooked the fact that, after privatisation, the independent regulator—the Director General of Gas Supply—will have a duty to promote the efficient use of gas.

Motor Fuel

3. Mr. Chope asked the Secretary of State for Energy what steps he takes to monitor the pump price of motor fuel.

The Minister of State, Department of Energy (Mr. Alick Buchanan-Smith): Sample data on oil product prices are collected by my Department on a weekly and monthly basis.

Mr. Chope: Does my right hon. Friend agree that some major petrol companies are still charging as much as 10p per gallon more than they need to? Will he take this opportunity to pay tribute to the independent retailers for the great work that they are doing in bringing down the price of petrol to the ordinary consumer?

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: My hon. Friend rightly draws attention to the fact that it is highly significant that there is a big variety in petrol prices. It is up to the motorist to demonstrate that he believes the price is too high by purchasing his petrol from the cheapest source.

Mr. Skinner: It is a funny sort of Government who are telling the people involved in the oil industry that they cannot interfere in the price of their fuel, yet, when it came to gas and electricity, the Government were prepared to tax both. Why do they have double standards?

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: For the simple reason that the oil industry is in private hands.

Mr. Beaumont-Dark: Does my right hon. Friend agree that it is important that petrol companies' pricing policy should respond to the market more regularly than it does? Would it not be easier for the companies if successive Chancellors did not use the oil prices as a milch cow so that, whenever the oil price seems to be coming down, Chancellors try to get their hands on what is left?

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: No doubt my hon. Friend will direct his views to my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, but I agree that there is good reason for lower petrol prices now, as several companies have perfectly properly and correctly shown the way. There is scope for oil companies, and I hope that they will respond to it.

Mr. Rogers: Further to the Minister's answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner), is he saying that the Government give special treatment to energy sources that are in private hands compared to those in public hands? Is he saying that there are two levels of Government evaluation in the industry?

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: In response to two earlier questions and as my hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Chope) pointed out in his supplementary question, I said that we have already seen the scope for independent companies to charge lower prices, for the benefit of the consumer.

Sir Anthony Meyer: Does my right hon. Friend find it as odd as I do that petrol prices along the motorways are virtually identical at every pump? Is he satisfied that competition is as it should be there?

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: I have not personally made a study of petrol prices along motorways, but I notice that along other major routes one finds a big variation between one petrol station and another—even between those in quite close proximity. If my hon. Friend has evidence of any unfairness in competition, I hope that he will draw it to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry or the Office of Fair Trading. There are powers in the OFT to deal with any anti-competitive action.

Mr. Orme: Does the Minister agree that some of the prices that are now being charged are a scandal? What action will he take to deal with the problem?

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: As other hon. Members have said, and as I have described, there is a wide variety of petrol prices, and the consumer has the opportunity to exercise his choice. That demonstrates the freedom that the consumer has.

Energy Efficiency

4. Mrs. Roe asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will report on the progress of the energy efficiency demonstration scheme.

Mr. Peter Walker: I am pleased to report that the energy efficiency demonstration scheme achieved its target of stimulating annual energy savings worth £120 million by the beginning of this year.

Mrs. Roe: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the new techniques and technologies applied in this demonstration project will be welcomed? Can he give the number of replications that have taken place? Will the Hertfordshire county council waste-derived fuel project qualify for grant under this scheme?

Mr. Walker: I cannot answer the latter question without studying the application. In terms of duplication, I am pleased to say that the energy-saving technologies pioneered through the scheme have been taken up in more than 5,600 different locations in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels: Being a great fan of energy efficiency and how energy is saved, can my right hon. Friend tell the House how often local authorities, major businesses and the captains of industry are approached to establish what savings they could make under the scheme? Large savings could be made through this important project.

Mr. Walker: In terms of industry, the early morning breakfast special briefing sessions have been a great success. In terms of local authorities, LAMSAC has made an analysis showing that local authorities could save more than £100 million a year by applying basic energy efficiency. I am glad to say that many local authorities are doing this, and I hope that many more will follow.

Nuclear Power Industry

5. Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the safety record of the nuclear power industry.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Energy (Mr. Alastair Goodlad): The nuclear power industry has an excellent record on site and environmental safety. The Government and the industry are determined that the existing high standards should be upheld and improved further.

Mr. Proctor: Does my hon. Friend agree that nuclear power is the safest source of energy known to mankind?

Mr. Goodlad: My hon. Friend is right. Nuclear power is not only the cheapest and cleanest, but the safest form of electricity generation.

Mr. Rogers: Does the Minister accept that the safety record of some nuclear power installations is appalling? In addition to the present crisis in the industry caused by accidents, does he accept that the long-term effects of low-level radiation are severe and have not been quantified?

Mr. Goodlad: The hon. Gentleman is wrong. Recent incidents have been exaggerated out of all proportion. None has presented a radiological hazard to the public. Each incident is rigorously investigated to see whether any lessons may be learnt.

Mr. Hannam: Is not the problem one of communication and a lack of understanding of the definitions used in the nuclear industry? Will my hon. Friend urge the new chairman of British Nuclear Fuels Ltd. to evolve a better descriptive system of radioactivity so that people are not scared by the stories spread about fairly low levels of radioactive waste emissions?

Mr. Goodlad: I agree with my hon. Friend about the importance of communication. The new chairman of BNFL is extremely keen, as was his predecessor, to give simple explanations about the nuclear industry, without any sacrifice of accuracy.

Mr. Hardy: Is the Minister telling the House that the system of inspection is thorough? Is he giving the House an assurance that the number of inspectors supervising the nuclear power industry is adequate in number and in qualification?

Mr. Goodlad: Yes, Sir.

Mr. Chapman: Is my hon. Friend aware that the recent report of the Select Committee on the Environment expressing concern about some aspects of radioactive waste management was not concerned with all aspects of nuclear power, and that those who construe it as an attack on the nuclear industry are telling falsehoods?

Mr. Goodlad: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, who is a distinguished member of that Select Committee, for his clarification.

National Coal Board

6. Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Energy whether the terms of appointment of the chairman of the National Coal Board contain any conditions relating to the publication by him of any book relating to his period in office.

Mr. David Hunt: No, Sir.

Mr. Dalyell: Is it true that about six months before Cortonwood, in the autumn of 1983, Mr. MacGregor and the Prime Minister discussed the scenario and politics of a long drawn out coal strike? That is a simple straightforward question.

Mr. Hunt: No, Sir.

Mr. Marlow: Will my hon. Friend, even at this late stage, seek to include in the terms of appointment of the next chairman of the National Coal Board a requirement, given my hon. Friend's enthusiasm for privatisation, that we should move towards some areas of privatisation within the National Coal Board?

Mr. Hunt: I should make it clear to my hon. Friend that the Government have no plans for privatisation. Details of Mr. MacGregor's terms of appointment and remuneration are set out in the National Coal Board's annual report and accounts.

Mr. Douglas: In view of the remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell), will the Minister give an assurance that there is no hangover in Scotland of the vindictive attitude of Mr. MacGregor, especially in relation to the re-engagement of victimised mineworkers? Will he give assurances that the management structure, particularly in Scotland, will be subject to an independent investigation?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question relates to a book. Is all this to be in the book?

Mr. Douglas: I was referring to a hangover of the vindictive attitude of Mr. MacGregor, apparently displayed in the book.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman has asked his question. I think that we have grasped it.

Mr. Hunt: The hon. Gentleman is inaccurate in his description of the attitude. In any event, it is a matter for the National Coal Board.

Mr. Eadie: Why is the Minister being so coy with the House when he knows that it has been well trailered that Mr. MacGregor will get £100,000 for writing the book, in which he boasts and brags that, in the fictional style of Rambo, he was able to win the miners dispute? Why should the most expensive chairman of any nationalised industry be allowed such personal aggrandisement?

Mr. Hunt: The hon. Gentleman is incorrect in almost all of that question.

Electricity Generation

7. Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Energy what percentage of electricity in the United Kingdom is produced by nuclear power stations; and what plans he has to increase the percentage.

Mr. Goodlad: Twenty per cent. of the electricity available from the United Kingdom public supply system was generated by nuclear power in 1985. The nuclear share is expected to rise to about 25 per cent. by the end of the decade. Thereafter, the contribution from new nuclear capacity will depend on the decision of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State on Sizewell B and upon decisions on subsequent applications to build new stations.

Mr. Taylor: As it is clearly in the national interest to expand the nuclear power building programme, will the Minister discuss with his colleagues how to reduce the crazy and absurd planning and inquiry delays which take place when a station is planned, especially as the Government have found it possible to promote the building of a Channel tunnel without any public inquiry at all?

Mr. Goodlad: Planning matters are for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment. As the House knows, the Government have made it clear on a number of occasions that the Sizewell inquiry should be full and wide ranging. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will lose no time in reaching a decision once the inspector has presented his report.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: When nuclear systems at nuclear plants are found to be deficient, should not the Government ensure that the equipment is modernised and changed as soon as possible?

Mr. Goodlad: I know that the Central Electricity Generating Board would agree entirely with the hon. Gentleman, as I do.

Sir Trevor Skeet: As it takes about eight years to construct a nuclear power station and many of the Magnox stations are due for retirement in the 1990s or probably shortly afterwards, will not the 20 per cent. proportion fall rather than rise? Does my hon. Friend agree that it is most important for the Government to press on with more nuclear power stations?

Mr. Goodlad: The Government have made clear their commitment to nuclear power. As I have said, future power station order decisions must await the outcome of the Sizewell inquiry.

Mr. Skinner: What is the point of concentrating on nuclear power when the North sea contains gas and oil and when we have 300 years of coal under the ground? Why continue with this folly?

Mr. Goodlad: As the hon. Gentleman knows, nuclear power is cheaper, cleaner and safer than other forms of energy. The Government, like their predecessors, believe that it is in the national interest to have a range of supply options. As the hon. Gentleman also knows, the Government are heavily committed to the coal industry, as evidenced by our enormous investment in it.

Coal Industry

8. Mr. Robert B. Jones asked the Secretary of State for Energy what are the latest available productivity figures for the Nottinghamshire area of the National Coal Board; and if he will make a statement.

10. Mr. Merchant asked the Secretary of State for Energy what are the latest available productivity figures for the National Coal Board; and if he will make statement.

11. Mr. Ashby asked the Secretary of State for Energy what are the latest available productivity figures for the south midlands area of the National Coal Board; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Walker: The National Coal Board's average revenue deep-mined productivity in the week ending 22 March was 3·08 tonnes per manshift. The corresponding figures for the Nottinghamshire and south Midlands areas were 3·38 tonnes per manshift and 3·12 tonnes per manshift respectively. Continued growth in productivity is the key to providing the coal industry with a secure future.

Mr. Jones: Does my right hon. Friend agree that co-operation rather than confrontation is the answer, in the interests of consumers, miners and the board alike, and do not these figures clearly show the benefits that can be gained from such co-operation?

Mr. Walker: I do agree. These remarkable figures are far better than any that have been available since nationalisation.

Mr. Rogers: Does the Secretary of State accept that in most circumstances productivity is a function of investment? Does he agree also that if the same investment were made in the south Wales coalfield as has been made in other parts of the United Kingdom, productivity would be at the same levels? I am thinking in particular of the Margam new mine. Ian MacGregor gave a promise during the miners' strike that at the end of the strike the investment would be available for the opening of the Margam new mine. Is Ian MacGregor a liar, or will the NCB now invest in the Margam new mine?

Mr. Walker: The hon. Gentleman should study the facts. As a result of "Plan for Coal" produced by the last Labour Government, the investment took place but the productivity did not. I am pleased to say that productivity has now taken place in south Wales as well as everywhere else.

Mr. Andy Stewart: In view of my right hon. Friend's information about the productivity achieved in Nottinghamshire, largely due to the close co-operation between management and the Union of Democratic Miners, will my right hon. Friend advise the chairman of the NCB to leave Nottinghamshire with a lasting memory of him by negotiating with the UDM a permanent lower retirement age of 55?

Mr. Walker: I cannot commit the board to the details of its negotiations. That must be a matter for the board.

Mr. O'Brien: In the three comparisons that the right hon. Gentleman gave, is the gigajoule value the same in each case?

Mr. Walker: I cannot say, but I shall inform the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Gerald Howarth: Is my right hon. Friend also aware that in the western area productivity records are being broken? Will he join me in congratulating the miners in my constituency in the Lea Hall pit, as well as in the Littleton pit in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshire, South, (Mr. Cormack)? Does he agree that security for those men can best be achieved through increased productivity?

Mr. Walker: Yes. As we saw throughout the coal dispute, many Tory Members of Parliament are now representing mining constituencies. Given the increased earnings of miners during the period of this Government, I hope that after the next election even more Tory Members of Parliament will be representing such constituencies.

Mr. Wrigglesworth: Does the Secretary of State agree that productivity in the best pits has reached 5 tonnes per shift per man? Does he also agree that the increase in productivity to which he has rightly paid tribute has largely been reached as a result of the closure of unproductive capacity? Will he ensure that productivity in the pits that remain open moves up to the best levels available?

Mr. Walker: The improvement in productivity as a result of the closure of uneconomic pits is a factor, but some pits that have been major loss-makers for years are now reaching productivity levels that mean they will be able to survive.

Mr. Eadie: The right hon. Gentleman saw fit to refer to "Plan for Coal", and he will recall that "Plan for Coal" referred to fluctuations in the market in relation to oil. Can he give an assurance that the miners who are now achieving record production will not be subject to the fluctuations in the market and that the CEGB will not be allowed to bring in massive coal imports?

Mr. Walker: The future for coal, oil, gas or any other form of energy depends on the manner in which energy for this country can be produced at competitive prices. I am delighted that the enormous improvement in productivity under this Government gives the coal industry a better chance than it would otherwise have had.

Heat and Power Projects

9. Mr. Rost asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will list the combined heat and power projects which the Central Electricity Generating Board and area boards have adopted and supported, under the provisions of the Energy Act 1983.

Mr. Goodlad: This is primarily a matter for the boards themselves. I understand that since May 1983 they have appraised 19 potential combined heat and power projects, of which six remain under active consideration. The chairman of the Electricity Council has told me that boards will continue their efforts to identify economic CHP projects in line with the provisions of the Energy Act 1983 and their other statutory duties.

Mr. Rost: Is my hon. Friend satisfied that where independent feasibility studies conducted by city CHP consortia show a rate of return as good as or better than electricity-only new power stations, CHP schemes will be adopted and supported?

Mr. Goodlad: The Government want to see the development of CHP schemes that make commercial sense. That is why the Energy Act 1983 placed a duty on electricity boards to adopt and support viable projects and created a guaranteed market for the sale of electricity from CHP schemes. The Act provides that boards may adopt and support only those projects that meet their financial criteria. Boards apply the same financial criteria to potential investment in CHP as to their other expenditure. As I have said, six schemes are under scrutiny at the moment. It is for boards to evaluate these and consider what part they should play consistent with their statutory duties.

Mr. Frank Cook: Will the Minister tell the House the size of the annual budget allocated for research, development, demonstration and monitoring of CHP? Will he compare that with the annual budget for other alternative renewable and clean sources of energy?

Mr. Goodlad: In addition to what I have said, I should say that we have made available grant-aid of £250,000 each to consortia from Leicester, Edinburgh and Belfast towards the preparation of prospectuses for CHP district heating schemes.

Coal Industry (Investment)

12. Mr. Barron asked the Secretary of State for Energy if, when he next meets the chairman of the National Coal Board, he will raise with him the board's new coalfield investment programme.

Mr. Peter Walker: I meet the chairman of the National Coal Board regularly to discuss all aspects of the industry, including investment programmes.

Mr. Barron: Can the Secretary of State clarify the position about new investment in the British coalfields? Can he tell us about the new investment that is proposed for the south Warwickshire coalfield? I wrote to the right hon. Gentleman on 26 March asking him to clarify a matter concerning three of his right hon. Friends who put their names to a document aimed at stopping investment in the new pit that is proposed for the south Warwickshire coalfield. We hear Minister after Minister saying that the Government are committed to the coal industry and to its future. Will he clarify this with the Coal Board? Even if I cannot get a reply to my letter, that might let us know exactly what the Government have in store for the British coalfields.

Mr. Walker: The Government are spending £2 million a day on the coal industry, and that is rather more than any Labour Government ever spent. I have not received any proposal from the Coal Board about the project in south Warwickshire. The board is presently conducting environmental impact assessments.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: Having seen for himself the problems created by a previous Agriculture Minister who urged farmers to produce more food at three times the price at which the public could buy it from abroad, will my right hon. Friend be cautious and not encourage the National Coal Board to do exactly the same thing by producing coal at 60 per cent. more than the price at which we can buy it from Australia?

Mr. Walker: I am sorry if my hon. Friend regrets that Britain attained a tolerable self-sufficiency in food. I notice that he would prefer to import food rather than that we should produce it ourselves.

Mr. Allen McKay: When the Secretary of State is looking at new investment, will he also look at old investment? Does he agree that capital investment 10 year ago on plans that have been destroyed by the Government and the Coal Board is now affecting too few men? Will he look at Redbrook, where manpower has been run down from 1,250 to 488? Does he not agree that in such cases the capital debt should be wiped out?

Mr. Walker: Capital debts have to be reviewed over a period of time. Investment in our coal industry dwarfs investment in that industry in the whole of the rest of western Europe.

Coal (Opencast Production)

14. Mr. Fallon asked the Secretary of State for Energy whether he will ask the National Coal Board to expand opencast production.

Mr. David Hunt: As my right hon. Friend has said, opencast coal has an important role in securing a healthy future for the coal industry. It is for the National Coal Board to decide the level of opencast production necessary for its market requirements.

Mr. Fallon: Is my hon. Friend aware that in the north-east we have been denied low-cost production and much needed jobs by county councils acting as wholly-owned subsidiaries of the National Union of Mineworkers and by a Coal Board that balances opencast mining against deep mine production? Has the time not come to free opencast from the dead hand of Hobart House and allow it to expand as one of our growth industries?

Mr. Hunt: As my hon. Friend is aware, the changes to licensing arrangements would require legislation, for which there are no plans at present. The existing arrangements can work well if they are used properly.

Mr. Eadie: Will the Minister bear in mind that the problem about opencast coal mining is not just that it causes noise and visual pollution, but that it is a form of vandalism, in that good seams cannot be worked and are sterilised and lost as a result of some opencast operations, which is wasteful?

Mr. Hunt: The hon. Gentleman must be aware that many deep mines depend on opencast production for blending to provide an acceptable product that customers, particularly in electricity generation and the industrial market, want.

THE ARTS

Sponsorship

35. Mr. Alan Howarth asked the Minister for the Arts what assessment he has made of the implications for sponsorship of the arts of the provisions in the Budget relating to charitable giving.

The Minister for the Arts (Mr. Richard Luce): I believe that sponsorship should increase significantly because businesses will now be able to make one-off donations, including the support of capital projects.

Mr. Howarth: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the Government's achievement in increasing spending on the arts by some 10 per cent. in real terms since 1979 has stimulated demand for additional expenditure? Does he also agree that additional funding for the arts should come from a variety of sources and that through the incentives in the Budget for charitable giving the Government are fulfilling their duty to provide a sound framework for a worthwhile encouragement for support of the arts?

Mr. Luce: I agree with my hon. Friend. In addition to the basic funding that the Government provide, we must look to the private sector to help fuel the expansion of the arts. There is an increasing demand for arts activities. My hon. Friend is right to say that the relief provided in the Budget will be a strong encouragement to arts bodies to raise extra funds.

Mr. Cormack: Did my right hon. Friend see the all-party motion supporting the new measures introduced in the Budget? Is he aware that there is still some doubt as to what these mean? Does he have it in mind to produce some easy to understand document that can be distributed?

Mr. Luce: I welcome the all-party support for the Budget changes. As to getting the information across, there still has to be the debate in the Finance Committee. We have strong views as to how we can educate businesses in the possibilities of giving and persuade arts bodies to become more professional in getting their case across. Hon. Members can do a great deal to help.

Mr. Buchan: The Minister is reverting to the proposition that he will rely on private sponsorship and similar means to bring about expansion, and not provide public funding. Given the background of cuts—some £19 million was lost by the abolition of the GLC and the metropolitan counties that has not been refunded—are we not looking at a standstill in public funding and relying on private funding, which will lead to a decline?

Mr. Luce: The hon. Gentleman is wrong. The worst forecasts about disaster in the arts have been proved to be wrong and things are going well for arts organisations. As to the Government's policy, we are committed to keeping up our support for the arts. However, for expansion and growth there should be a partnership between the Government, local authorities and the private sector, and the private sector can play an even more prominent role than it does.

36. Mr. Greenway asked the Minister for the Arts if he will estimate the amount of money by which the arts will benefit as a result of the Budget; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Luce: That depends entirely on the energy of the arts bodies and the generosity with which people respond to the new opportunities. The Association for Business Sponsorship of the Arts has estimated that the additional figure might be £10 million. I believe that this could be much more.

Mr. Greenway: Is not the sky the limit for the arts as a result of the Budget, and should not arts bodies be aiming for £50 million at least? Is it not urgent for my right hon. Friend to set up the advisory body that he has already mentioned to instruct and assist arts bodies in promoting themselves, whatever they are doing, in a way that brings in money?

Mr. Luce: The arts bodies must be encouraged to be as competitive and professional as possible in getting across the activities that they have to sell to the public and to persuade businesses to fund them. We shall do all that we can to help them in that process. The scope is enormous and the extent to which we succeed in raising extra money depends upon the professionalism and enthusiasm of arts bodies in Britain.

Mr. Dormand: How much importance does the right hon. Gentleman place on the appreciation of film in the arts? In view of the devastating legislation which the Government have carried in this Parliament against the film industry, will he give an assurance that he will do all that he can to make public money available for the appreciation of film, particularly as Britain is now producing some of the best films in the world?

Mr. Luce: As the hon. Gentleman must know, the Government already give over £9 million to the British Film Institute, which is considerable support on the part of the taxpayer and is of great encouragement to the film industry. Indeed, in the hon. Gentleman's area in Tyne and Wear support for the film industry is strong.

Mr. Dalyell: The Minister referred to his strong views on private funding. Will he tell us exactly what those views are?

Mr. Luce: I thought that I had made them plain, but I am delighted to have another opportunity. The private sector can play an increasingly important role in helping arts bodies in addition to the basic funding provided by the taxpayer, and, indeed, by the ratepayer and local authorities. The changes provided for in the Budget will give every encouragement to that. With the Government's sponsorship incentive scheme we have a wide range of incentives to increase support from the private sector.

37. Mr. Jessel asked the Minister for the Arts what effects he expects the 1986 Budget proposals to have upon the arts.

Mr. Luce: The effect will be to strengthen the prospects for widening the sources of funding for all arts bodies.

Mr. Jessel: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the £100 give-as-you-earn scheme provides an important opportunity for the arts to obtain more funds, but, as the arts will be competing with other charities, will there not be a need for a great deal of local promotion, locally organised with great vigour?

Mr. Luce: I agree entirely with my hon. Friend, and this is where hon. Members can do a great deal to help in their constituencies in encouraging support for the arts in that way. My hon. Friend is right to draw attention, in addition to the incentives provided for corporations to give, to the incentives which will be introduced from 1 April next year to provide for payroll giving to charitable bodies. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer plans to introduce a consultation document on that, but the sooner we start educating the public in the possibilities the better.

Mr. Meadowcroft: I welcome the taxation incentives for charities and artistic organisations, but is the Minister aware of another anomaly, in that if anything is published in a brochure which at all looks like an advertisement it is liable to VAT, and that inhibits the amount of publicity that could be given to a sponsoring organisation? Will the right hon. Gentleman look at that anomaly?

Mr. Luce: I shall look at that, but I cannot promise any change.

Arts Funding

38. Mr. Chapman asked the Minister for the Arts what recent representations he has received about the effect on arts funding in London of the demise of the Greater London council.

Mr. Luce: I have received a number of representations, but I am happy to say that the position of the vast majority of arts organisations in Greater London has been made secure.

Mr. Chapman: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the first benefit deriving from the abolition of the GLC should be the more efficient management of the South Bank complex, in the interests of those who care about the arts throughout Britain, as well as Londoners? Will he confirm that that should be a top priority of the South Bank board under its able chairman in the year ahead?

Mr. Luce: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for referring to the South Bank, because under the leadership of Ronnie Grierson we have had a smooth and efficient takeover of responsibilities at considerable personal sacrifice in terms of his time and because he is acting without a salary. It is already becoming clear that the South Bank will operate more efficiently and at lower administrative costs than it has in the past.

Mr. Freud: Will the Minister bear in mind the considerable pleasure which was brought to schools and old people's homes by the GLC and metropolitan counties which sponsored theatrical tours, and will he do his best to let successor bodies have similar productions, which will give a great deal of pleasure to those people?

Mr. Luce: I note what the hon. Gentleman says. Much of this is to do with the Arts Council and with local authorities, but I am extremely encouraged by successor authorities' responses, following abolition, to appeals to participate in support for the arts. Today the Westminster city council has announced that it will provide over £3 million for the support of the arts in Greater London. I warmly welcome that.

National Railway Museum, York

39. Mr. Adley asked the Minister for the Arts if he will pay a visit to the National Railway museum, York.

Mr. Luce: I hope to do so before long.

Mr. Adley: Is my right hon. Friend aware that he will be extremely welcome? Is he further aware that the museum, in addition to showing off the country's history, currently runs a number of steam locomotives and thus earns money for the museum? Will he confirm that the Government's policy is to encourage museums to earn money from such occupations and to keep and reinvest such earnings?

Mr. Luce: I know of my hon. Friend's keen interest in such matters. I look forward to my visit to the National Railway museum at York. My hon. Friend is right to say that the museum, as part of the Science museum, is being encouraged to raise extra revenue without obstacles being put in its way by the Government. In that way I hope that increased resources will help to provide a better service.

CIVIL SERVICE

Civil Servants (Employment Policy)

43. Mr. Dalyell asked the Minister for the Civil Service if he will make a statement on his response to the First Division Association's representations over the position of civil servants arising out of the Westland affair.

The Minister of State, Privy Council Office (Mr. Richard Luce): No, Sir.

Mr. Dalyell: What do the Government think of the view of Sir Frank Cooper, a former permanent secretary at the Ministry of Defence, set out in the Suntory-Toyota lecture at the London School of Economics, that the post of chief information officer at No. 10 Downing street has become a political party post rather than a Civil Service post and should not be occupied by a civil servant? What do the Government say to Lord Bancroft, who thinks that over the Westland affair Ministers abused the Civil Service? Should not such heavyweight opinions be taken seriously? Is Mr. Bernard Ingham's position any longer tenable?

Mr. Luce: The hon. Gentleman is talking absolute nonsense. The position has been made clear time and again by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and in evidence to the Select Committee by Sir Robert Armstrong. I disagree with everything that the hon. Gentleman has said.

Sir David Price: Does my right hon. Friend recognise the particular problem for press officers, information officers and public relations men in the Civil Service when their trade as public relations men marries ill with the traditional anonymity of the Civil Service and is almost a contradiction in terms?

Mr. Luce: I note what my hon. Friend has to say, but the principle of the impartiality of the Civil Service remains at the foundation of its success. It must stay that way.

Mr. Wrigglesworth: Does the Minister accept that when there is a breakdown of collective responsibility, as there was over the Westland affair, and on other occasions, civil servants can be put in a frightful dilemma, which is not catered for in the Armstrong memorandum? Will the Minister therefore examine the matter again to ensure that such circumstances as arose during the Westland affair are catered for in a redraft of the memorandum?

Mr. Luce: The Select Committee on the Treasury and Civil Service is about to publish its findings after months of investigation into the relationship between the Civil Service and Ministers. Naturally, we await that report with interest.

Dr. McDonald: Will the Minister take on board the fact that the breakdown of the collective responsibility of Ministers during the Westland affair has created a new situation? Will he ensure that the Government do not merely use waiting for the Select Committee's report as an excuse for delay? Do the Government agree that it is absolutely necessary to provide an update of the statement on civil servants' duties beyond Sir Robert Armstrong's letter of last year and to provide an independent body to which civil servants can refer in cases involving conflicts of conscience?

Mr. Luce: The guidelines provided by Sir Robert Armstrong and announced in February 1985 provide a good basis for civil servants. The hon. Lady might be interested to know that the Council of Civil Service Unions is due to meet Sir Robert Armstrong shortly, when all these matters about the relationship between civil servants and their Ministers can be discussed.

Mr. Dalyell: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. In view of the unsatisfactory nature of that reply, I beg to give notice that I shall seek to raise Mr. Bernard Ingham's position on the Adjournment at the earliest opportunity.

Northern Region

44. Mr. Dormand asked the Minister for the Civil Service how many Civil Service posts have been transferred to the northern region since 1979.

Mr. Luce: The dispersal programme announced on 26 July 1979 did not include the transfer of any posts to the northern region. No proposals for major relocation of Government work to the northern region have been made since 1979. Details of posts that may have been transferred there by Departments for management reasons are not held centrally.

Mr. Dormand: Is the Minister aware that the Prime Minister and the Chancellor of the Exchequer assured me last year that the 1985 so-called Budget results would increase employment in the northern region, whereas in fact unemployment has been increased. As this year's Budget will further increase unemployment in the northern region, does the Minister agree that it takes direct action, such as the transferring of Civil Service jobs, to reduce unemployment? In view of what he said, will he assure me that the matter will be seriously considered?

Mr. Luce: I understand the hon. Gentleman's concern about unemployment in his region. The fact is that the northern region has a higher proportion of civil servants in relation to the working population than have most other regions in the country. When it comes to relocations, under existing Government Department policies the Departments are asked to put regions first when considering giving support to other areas and moving civil servants outside London.

Mr. Dickens: Is it not a fact that there are now 150,000 fewer people working for the Civil Service than was the case when the Government came into office? Despite this, I understand that the efficiency of the Civil Service is as high today as it has ever been in the history of the service. Since that is the case, will the Minister give the Civil Service a pat on the back on behalf of this House?

Mr. Luce: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. Against the background of a considerable reduction in the size of the Civil Service, to just under 600,000 compared with 733,000 in 1979, it is true to say that, under the reforms that have taken place, in that time civil servants have become even more professional than they were before. They are performing their duties admirably.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Why does the right hon. Gentleman not answer the question asked by his hon. Friend? Is it not true that civil servants up and down the land are complaining about the lack of numbers and about the fact that they cannot cope? Why does the Minister not answer directly and tell us what civil servants are saying to him privately?

Mr. Luce: Perhaps I should say in answer to the earlier question that four out of five civil servants are already working outside London. As I have said, the northern region takes a larger proportion of the working Civil Service population than do most other regions. Certainly we have a strong interest in the regions, but I have said what is happening.

Mr. Forth: Why should civil servants be relocated to the north, rather than the west midlands or anywhere else, other than on the criterion of efficiency?

Mr. Luce: The last word used by my hon. Friend is right, because clearly efficiency is the key in this case. It is extremely expensive to move civil servants from one region to another or, indeed, from the centre to regions. Our dispersal policy, still to be completed, involves moving 5,900 civil servants to the regions.

Mr. Pavitt: Does the Minister realise that there is a crisis in Newcastle on Tyne because of the shortage of civil servants employed on social security matters? All hon. Members know that, whenever we have constituency surgeries, elderly people come to see us because pension books are not coming through on time. Something should be done to provide more, not fewer, civil servants.

Mr. Luce: The hon. Gentleman will have noticed that there is flexibility, in that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services has already announced a plan to increase the number of civil servants in the DHSS to enable it to cope with some of the problems. There is flexibility in the Government's policy.

Mr. Fallon: What sense does it make to pay London weighting allowance to civil servants in London when the same work can be done more cheaply and beneficially in regions such as the north-east and the north-west, which have high unemployment?

Mr. Luce: As I said earlier, four out of five civil servants work in the regions. In London, we must have a policy that encourages recruitment and retention. Our policies are designed to that end.

Mr. Wrigglesworth: Will the Minister refute the suggestion that is made in the Financial Times this morning that the London weighting will be further increased because vacancies for civil servants in London cannot be filled? Will he reconsider providing more Civil Service posts in the regions, where they can be filled overnight?

Mr. Luce: London weighting has been considered in the context of the annual pay discussions. The key question, which we must ask, is whether we are pursuing policies in the Civil Service in London which allow adequate recruitment and retention.

Libya

3.30 pm

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Does it arise out of questions?

Mr. Dalyell: Yes. Precisely because I did not put in a private notice question I feel that, on behalf of several Back Benchers, I am entitled to ask whether it is not extraordinary that, in the middle of the crisis concerning Libya and the British bases, the House of Commons is to hear nothing. Would not any visitor consider it extraordinary if we were to spend eight and a half hours debating Sunday trading and yet, as a Legislature, be told nothing about the United States or Soviet position or to have a statement on the crisis?

You will know, Mr. Speaker, that I have thought for a long time that you are a very superior Speaker to George Thomas. [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am enjoying this.

Mr. Dalyell: George Thomas made certain judgments of his own, such as that in April 1982 that the Prime Minister ought to be supported on the south Atlantic issue. We read that in his memoirs. There is no secret about it. That happened during one of the last crises, when he was Speaker, concerning those islands in the south Atlantic. Do you not think, Mr. Speaker, that it is matter of some judgment whether circumstances that are a matter of war, or potential war, outside Europe, entitle Parliament to a report from Ministers? There might be a judgment about the safety of British subjects. You know that I am one of those hon. Members who have constituents who are involved, and at risk, near Tripoli. Bearing in mind the circumstances, why does the House not have at least a Foreign Office or Prime Ministerial report on this urgent matter?

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): Further to the point of order, Mr. Speaker. I note the hon. Gentleman's well-deserved tribute to you. I am sure that you will always call him for his share, but I hope that you will not call him more often than that.

Mr. Geoffrey Dickens (Littleborough and Saddleworth): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I have just recently left the Table Office, where I endeavoured to table a straightforward question, which any hon. Member would wish to table. If I can explain——

Mr. Speaker: Is this further to the point of order?

Mr. Dickens: No, but it is a point of order arising out of questions.

Mr. Speaker: Let me deal with the first point of order.

Mr. Andrew Faulds (Warley, East): Further to the point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Briefly, please.

Mr. Faulds: I strongly reiterate the comments about you, Mr. Speaker. The only reason why I did not trouble your private office this morning to raise a private notice question on the dangers to peace in the middle east caused by the American President's cretinous behaviour was that I was sure that an hon. Member would have tabled, and been granted the opportunity to raise, a private notice question. I am surprised that that did not happen. Is it in order to seek leave to move the Adjournment of the House under Standing Order No. 10, to raise the issue?

Mr. Speaker: I thank the hon. Member. Private notice question applications are not matters that are raised in the House. Many considerations must be taken into account. I fully understand and appreciate the concern of the House about this matter, and I shall bear that in mind tomorrow and during the rest of the week.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): Further to the point of order, Mr. Speaker. Events of great significance in the middle east may take place tonight. How can the House bring its views to bear before those events take place?

Mr. Speaker: It would have been possible for any hon. Member to apply before 12 o'clock to seek leave to move the Adjournment of the House under Standing Order No. 10 to raise this subject—they did not do so. If anything has happened since 12 o'clock, it would be in order to ask leave under Standing Order No. 10 now. Mr. Dickens.

Mr. Dickens rose——

Mr. Peter Shore (Bethnal Green and Stepney) rose——

Mr. Dickens: I was endeavouring to explain that a short time ago I left the Table Office——

Mr. Shore rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Dickens: You called me, Mr. Speaker. The right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore) should sit down.

Mr. Speaker: Order. In the interests of neatness, I shall hear the right hon. Member for Bethnal Green and Stepney (Mr. Shore).

Mr. Shore: Further to the original point of order, Mr. Speaker. My hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) has raised a matter of the utmost importance which should be treated with appropriate seriousness by both sides of the House. This is a matter in which our national interest is involved. As the Leader of the House is present, will he assure the House that hon. Members' feelings on this important matter will be conveyed to his right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and that a statement will be made at the earliest opportunity?

The Lord Privy Seal and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Biffen): Yes.

Parliamentary Questions

3.33 pm

Mr. Geoffrey Dickens (Littleborough and Saddleworth): I am sorry that I have had to rise for the third time and that you are seeking to hurry me, Mr. Speaker. I have been patient—other hon. Members have not.

Recently I left the Table Office after endeavouring to table a straightforward question on a matter of public importance. A man was convicted and sentenced to six months' imprisonment for assaulting two people. He was a child murderer, and had been released from Park Lane mental institution. I wanted an inquiry into the release of that man, who had struck again. I wanted the Minister to consider holding an inquiry into the criteria that we lay down in considering cases in which murderers are released into an unsuspecting society.

You have been praised by the House, Mr. Speaker, and you richly deserve it. I therefore feel that you will deal justly with me. The Table Office informed me that my questions had to be referred to the senior Clerks—the Establishment.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Any matters concerning referral should come to me—privately, if necessary.

Ministerial Interests

3.35 pm

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. During the weekend it was revealed that a senior Cabinet Minister, the Secretary of State for Transport, had made £4,000 from shares in the Jaguar company, which this Government have privatised. That followed on from the Prime Minister's making money out of Broken Hill, which made money out of the miners' strike. Many hon. Members and people outside the House are worried about the way in which Cabinet Ministers in particular can own shares——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I must stop the hon. Member. Points of order raised with me must concern Members' interests. I am not concerned with ministerial rules.

Mr. Skinner: You are absolutely right, Mr. Speaker. The Register of Members' Interests, for which you have responsibility because it is a matter for the House, not the Government, is inadequate to fulfil present-day needs. It is high time that it contained a separate section showing how many Cabinet Ministers own shares. The latest report is that nine Cabinet Ministers own shares.

Another matter which you should consider is that in the Register of Members' Interests only an hon. Member who owns more than 1 per cent. of the total shareholding must register his interest. That is why the Secretary of State for Transport has "Nil" beside his name. It is high time that all shares were disclosed in the Register and that we had a separate section on the Cabinet, especially in view of the latest scandals and all the money that Ministers have been making through their actions in the House.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is at liberty to put that suggestion to the Select Committee on Members' Interests.

MEMBER SWORN

3.40 pm

The following Member made the Affirmation required by law:

Wyvill Richard Nicholls Raynsford Esq., for Fulham.

Libya

3.41 pm

Mr. Andrew Faulds (Warley, East): Further to an earlier point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. We have dealt with that matter.

Mr. Faulds: No. Forgive me——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have dealt with points of order.

Mr. Faulds rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. Is it a new point of order?

Mr. Faulds: It is related to your responsibility——

Mr. Speaker: Order. We must move on.

Mr. Faulds rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I take points of order at the appropriate time, which is immediately after questions, and we have now moved on.

Mr. Faulds: No, Sir. I raised a point of order——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I shall take it if it is a new point of order, but I shall not take a point of order arising from a matter with which we have already dealt.

Mr. Faulds: In that case, it is a new point of order. The one reason why I did not apply for a debate under Standing Order No. 10 this morning was that I expected a statement from the Prime Minister.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is destroying a good reputation.

Mr. Faulds: I wanted a debate under Standing Order No. 10.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Faulds rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I said in answer to a previous question that if something new had happened since 12 o'clock an application under Standing Order No. 10 would be in order.

Mr. Faulds: It has. The Prime Minister has not come to the House.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Faulds rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Clerk will now proceed to read the Orders of the Day.

Mr. Faulds: Further to that point of order——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I shall not take it.

Mr. Faulds: There is a new point of order——

Mr. Speaker: Order. We will now proceed to the business set down for today.

Orders of the Day

Shops Bill [Lords]

Order for Second Reading read.

Mr. Speaker: I must announce to the House that I have not selected any of the amendments on the Order Paper. More than 65 right hon. and hon. Members have sought leave to take part in the debate, and there may well be others. Therefore, I propose to exercise my powers under the Standing Order to limit speeches to 10 minutes between 6 pm and 8 pm. I hope that that will be the pattern throughout the day so that the majority of right hon. and hon. Members who are anxious to participate can do so.

3.45 pm

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Douglas Hurd) rose——

Mr. Gerald Kaufman (Manchester, Gorton): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. There was a little noise in the Chamber when you made your announcement and I may not have heard exactly what you said. Am I to understand that you have not accepted for debate the reasoned amendment that has been tabled by Her Majesty's Opposition?

Mr. Speaker: I have not selected any of the amendments or instructions on the Order Paper.

Mr. Kaufman: Further to that point or order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is a decision that I have to take. There are a number of amendments and instructions on the Order Paper, and I have not selected any of them.

Mr. Ray Powell (Ogmore): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. This is a similar point of order to that raised by my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman). Is it usual for you to make such a ruling on a reasoned amendment that is directed to a measure as important as the Shops Bill?

Mr. Speaker: The Opposition's reasoned amendment and the other amendments on the Order Paper cover the main provisions of the Bill. I think that the entire House is well aware of the various issues that are likely to be raised in opposition to the Bill, from both sides of the House.

Mr. Hurd: I beg to move——

Mr. Peter Shore (Bethnal Green and Stepney): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Obviously I do not wish to challenge your ruling, but I find your refusal to select an amendment on Second Reading in the name of the Leader of the Opposition and his colleagues to be unprecedented. I should be grateful, Mr. Speaker, if you would inform the House why you have departed from all previous practice.

Mr. Speaker: There are precedents for not selecting reasoned amendments which cover the main conditions in Bills.

Mr. Alan Williams (Swansea, West): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The Bill raises matters of profound conscience and there is an early-day motion on the Order Paper, which has been signed by many hon. Members, which asks for a free vote. The Government have deliberately refused to allow that opportunity to hon. Members. The Opposition have endeavoured to meet the cross-House opinion on this matter—as I have said, the Bill involves issues of deep conscience—to enable some Conservative Members to express their opinion and concern. By your action, Mr. Speaker, you have made that protest on their part impossible.

Mr. Speaker: Not at all. The reasoned amendment covers the very points that hon. Members are likely to make for or against the Bill. That applies to hon. Members on both sides of the House. There is no controversy about that. If the reasoned amendment had called for a free vote, that might have been a different matter.

Mr. Neil Kinnock (Islwyn): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. You have just said that the matters covered by the reasoned amendment relate to the issues that hon. Members may wish to raise in contention against or qualification of their support for Second Reading. Surely that is the position on all debates, especially on Second Reading. That is most certainly the case in respect of a reasoned amendment. If that were not so, the use of the stratagem in the House would not come under the title "reasoned amendment."

If hon. Members have reservations about giving a Bill a Second Reading, they will want to specify those reasons by means of a reasoned amendment. It is a matter of great disquiet to the Opposition that what we thought was a mixture of reasoning and convention, time hallowed in this place—a device that allows us to set out our reasons for having strong reservations about giving the Bill a Second Reading—has not been accepted by you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The Leader of the Opposition has made the point exactly. In the course of debate Front-Bench and Back-Bench Members will state their reasons for having reservations in the very words that are contained in the reasoned amendment.

Mr. Kinnock: Mr. Speaker, I am sure you will recognise that the matters raised by your judgment today —naturally we are not challenging the wisdom or the judgment itself—have extremely important implications, not only for today's proceedings but for all other proceedings on Second Readings, whoever may be in Government or Opposition and whoever may propose a Bill, whether it be a private Member's or a public Bill. It is important that we have a clear and full understanding of the basis upon which the Opposition or any hon. Member may or may not table a reasoned amendment.

There have been cases, well within your memory, Mr. Speaker, and mine, in which there have been areas of contention, possibly not absolute, on certain Bills and, in order to specify reasons, especially on matters of great public importance, those against the Bill have been able to table a reasoned amendment.

Is it not the case in this adversarial House that the official Opposition, for all the natural and normal reasons, can expect to have more notice taken of their reasoned amendments than would possibly apply to others? On that basis, Mr. Speaker, I hope that you will not consider that the judgment you have made today will constitute a precedent on other occasions when we, or perhaps other hon. Members may wish to table a reasoned amendment.

Mr. Speaker: I have to make a judgment on these issues. I give the right hon. Gentleman an unequivocal assurance that I shall continue to consider every reasoned amendment most carefully. This is not a new situation. No binding precedent has been set for the future.

Mr. Frank Cook (Stockton, North): On a point of Order, Mr. Speaker. I accept your judgment, but in my lack of maturity as an hon. Member I feel that I must record my difficulty in understanding. It is possible for someone of such little experience as myself to misunderstand that this could be part of a covert stratagem to coerce Conservative Members to vote——

Mr. Speaker: Order, that is a thoroughly unworthy comment.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover) rose——

Mr. Williams: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Williams: It is on a point of information, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I shall accept it if it is a point of information.

Mr. Williams: I realise that it is difficult for you to give a snap judgment in relation to the arguments you have heard from the Opposition Front Bench this afternoon. As the issue refers to a vote which will take place at midnight, would you be willing to reconsider it and listen to arguments in detail during the debate to see whether the opportunity of a vote may be extended at the end?

Mr. Speaker: I fully accept that I am the servant of the House. I shall reconsider the matter, but the debate on Second Reading will proceed without the amendment at this stage.

Mr. Hurd: I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

The Bill falls into two main parts. It deals with Sunday trading and with the working hours of shop workers at all times. I propose to spend most of my time on the first part, Sunday trading, and my right hon. and learned Friend the Paymaster General will, of course, deal with points on the second part. I should like to clear the ground by beginning with a word of general explanation of the employment provisions.

The Shops Act 1950 requires that all shop workers must take a half-day holiday each week, should take specified meal and rest breaks during the working day and must take time-off in lieu of Sunday employment. Part II also sets more detailed restrictions on the working hours of young people — 16 and 17-year-olds. It sets their maximum hours and overtime and controls employment at night. There are no equivalent restrictions for adult shop workers.

The Bill, as originally drafted, aimed to remove the existing restrictions on adult shop workers but to leave in place the provisions for young people which we are reviewing separately.

Fundamental to our argument for lifting the restrictions on adults was the belief that these inflexible statutory restrictions do not reflect modern conditions. They originated during the early years of this century when retailing and society in general were different from today. We believe that the Shops Act 1950 employment provisions for adults are outdated and over restrictive.

[Mr. Hurd]

We believe that those repeals will not of themselves change the maximum hours that shop workers will normally be asked to work. The normal operation of the labour market has secured for shop workers as for other employees with no statutory restrictions, hours well within the potential hours permitted by the 1950 Act. Most employees determine their working conditions without that type of statutory restriction, and we believe that adult shop workers are just as capable of that. That is not to say that there is no place for the law or the Government. The Government intend to keep wages councils within this area, albeit with a modernised and restricted remit. There is now a raft of statutory protection for all employees covering social security, employment protection and health and safety at work, all of which post date shops legislation.

Therefore, we do not believe that there is justification for the view that the Bill, as originally drafted, would dangerously erode the working conditions of shop workers. On the other hand, unnecessary regulation spoils the ability of employers to adapt to changing circumstances and secure the success of their businesses. Despite those arguments, which seem to us to be compelling, in the other place the view was expressed that times have not changed to that extent, and that in shop workers we still have an exploited and vulnerable sector of the work force that is peculiarly in need of protection. Lord Denning's amendment to clause 2 was carried on that argument. His amendment retains indefinitely and in full all the employment provisions of the 1950 Act.

Facing that situation, we thought it right that this House should have the fullest opportunity to consider that particular matter, so we have not put forward proposals to alter the Bill since it came from another place. We shall listen carefully to what the House has to say before coming to our final view on what should happen about part II of the 1950 Act. That is why I say that at this stage we are not proposing any changes in the Bill, which has come to us from the other place.

Mr. Allan Rogers (Rhondda): Will the Home Secretary tell the House in what part of the Bill he will pay due regard to the principles and conscience of those who wish to preserve the special character of Sunday?

Mr. Hurd: Throughout, but particularly in the rest of my speech.

The controversy on Sunday trading, which has gone on inside and outside of the House for many months now, has been both strong and reasonably good tempered. So far as I am concerned, I want to keep it that way. There is scope for argument about the support for either side. Last week I received a group of eminent churchmen who reported to me more than 1 million signatures in petitions against the Bill. I was able to report to them a somewhat larger number of signatures in petitions in favour of the Bill——

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield): Nonsense.

Mr. Hurd: The hon. Gentleman says "Nonsense." The score available to me today is 1·4 million signatures in petitions in favour and 1·2 million against the Bill.

Mr. Sheerman: Is the Secretary of State aware that only today I have handed in a petition containing half a million signatures against the Bill, on behalf of the Co-operative movement?

Mr. Hurd: When all the statistics of polls and petitions have been swapped, two facts emerge, which I believe the House will accept. The first is that there is a very large body of opinion—I believe a majority, although not the most articulate — which no longer believes in a law which says, broadly, that shops can open when people are at work but not when they are free to go shopping. Within that body are many whose pattern of work and life make the present law highly restrictive or inconvenient for them.

Secondly, there is a large body that wants to keep Sunday special, and that body goes well beyond the ranks of regular churchgoers. Therefore, there are those two bodies of opinion, and many of us belong to both——

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Hurd: I should like to carry on for a little while, otherwise my speech will be unduly long. If my hon. Friend feels that he wants to intervene a little later, I shall give way to him.

Many of us see no contradiction between believing that the Shops Act 1950 is unworkable and should go and wanting to keep Sunday special. We see no difficulty or contradiction in belonging to both bodies of opinion.

Many people seem to argue as though the special nature of the English and Welsh Sunday has always been enforced by law. Of course, that is not so. All through the last century, and for half of this century, there was no effective law forbidding shops to open. At the high moment of the Victorian Sunday, when Mrs. Proudie and Mr. Slope railed against Sabbath day travelling, there was no effective law forbidding shopping on Sundays. Only in 1936 was the law brought into something like its present shape.

The House must discuss three options: first, whether to continue a 50-year experiment which brought in the criminal law to regulate one, and only one, part of human activity on Sunday — shopping — and an experiment which, in its present form, is collapsing; secondly, whether to rely for keeping Sunday special on tradition, persuasion and example, as in Scotland; or, finally, whether some compromise or middle way is possible. Those are the three choices before the House.

I do not believe that the first option to continue with the present law suffice. The 1950 Act no longer commands respect or compliance. I need not go through the ludicrous contradictions in the Act. Of course, no one defends them. As a result of the contradictions, enforcement is arbitrary.

Mr. A. E. P. Duffy (Sheffield, Attercliffe): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hurd: I shall continue my speech. The hon. Gentleman may find that I cover his point.

Mr. Duffy: My point relates to enforcement.

Mr. Hurd: I shall come to enforcement later.

In the first nine months of 1985, there were only 550 convictions for illegal Sunday opening. Within five miles of the House, one could find as many shops breaking the law on Sunday. This is a bad Act because it regulates indefensibly an activity which most people no longer regard as wrong. The co-operatives' poll shows that most people shop on Sundays, many of them buying items which are illegally sold.

Mr. Duffy rose——

Mr. Hurd: I shall give way later, if the hon. Gentleman persists. I wish to get on with my argument. I am describing as fairly as I can the three options that the House must consider.

In Kent last month I met a man who runs a garden centre. Two thirds of his trade is done on Sunday, mainly through families who come to the centre in the afternoon. His livelihood is now at the mercy and whim or calculation of anyone who can go to court and force his local council to prosecute him for illegal trading. On what possible social, economic or moral grounds should that man be forced out of business? That is the sort of thing that could happen under the existing law.

A time comes when the Government must step in and change a law which can produce such results. That is the purpose of the Bill, which repeals the central provisions of the Shops Act 1950. It does not compel Sunday opening. It leaves the decision to the choice of the shopkeeper and the customer and it provides for the protection of existing employees, because we accept that the deregulation of shopping hours will alter the position of shop workers, many of whom may have joined the industry originally because Sunday working was not expected and some workers may not wish to work on Sundays for religious, family or other reasons. We recognise their anxiety about the prospect of Sunday working, and the Bill contains two important safeguards to protect their position.

Clause 3 and schedule 1 establish two new statutory rights for shop workers who are in employment before the commencement date of the Act. The first right is that the dismissal of an existing shop worker who refuses to work on Sunday will be automatically unfair. Secondly, shop workers will have the right not to have other action, short of dismissal, taken against them by their employer because they have refused to work on Sunday. All shop workers employed on the day before the commencement date of the Act will enjoy those rights, unless they have agreed to work on Sunday irrespective of how long they have worked for their employers, the number of hours worked per week or their age.

Mr. Greenway: My right hon. Friend is making a most impressive speech. Is he aware, however, that the difficulty for many of us in that he is inviting us to endorse unrestricted Sunday trading on a principle of pay now by voting for it tonight and perhaps having a say later in amending the Bill in Committee? It is almost impossible for me to accept that.

Mr. Hurd: I am glad that I did not give way to my hon. Friend earlier. I am approaching the part of my speech which deals with the arrangements which my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House and I have in mind for this Bill.

Mr. Michael Meadowcroft (Leeds, West) rose——

Mr. Hurd: I wish to make progress before I give way again.

I have dealt with the concessions to protect the conscientious position of shop workers, and I wish to discuss the third option which I mentioned—a possible compromise.

I wish to make two general points before I do that. I have tried to follow this discussion as closely as I can, and two things continue to worry me about the position of those who wish to preserve the status quo or something like it. I can easily understand those who would say that keeping Sunday special should mean restricting what we or others do to what is necessary. However, most people take a different view, whether they are for or against the Bill. Most of us think it harmless to fill up a car with petrol on a Sunday, to take our families out to lunch or to visit a leisure centre or a stately home. But none of those activities is necessary. They all require staff. Nearly 9 million people now work on a Sunday, of whom 4 million work regularly. All those activities, pleasant though unnecessary, make a call on public services. I cannot for the life of me see what is uniquely harmful about a shopping expedition or why going shopping disrupts family life in a way that those other activities do not. I do not understand why shopping alone disrupts the rhythm of life so badly that we should continue to try to use the criminal law to prevent it.

Mr. Jonathan Sayeed (Bristol, East): Does my right hon. Friend wish to see the increased commercialisation of the Sabbath?

Mr. Hurd: The best answer to the problem of the decay of the 1950 Act is to keep the criminal law out of the matter. I shall deal with possible compromises in a moment.

I can deal more briefly with my second anxiety. I speak as someone who wants to keep Sunday special, who feels strongly about Sunday and who enjoys a traditional Sunday. The churches and others are entitled, and probably obliged, to persuade and to set an example in this respect as in others, and I wish them well in that. However, it is a sign of weakness to argue that the processes of persuasion or example are not enough. It is a sign of weakness to say that we are entitled to wheel in the criminal law to regulate an area which is not, for most people, criminal in an increasingly vain attempt to prevent people from doing what otherwise, from convenience or necessity, they might do.

Mr. John Stokes (Halesowen and Stourbridge): We are all listening with rapt attention to my right hon. Friend's excellent speech. We have heard his personal view that Sunday should in some way be kept special. Is that also the view of the Government, or are they purely neutral?

Mr. Hurd: I think that it is the view of the great majority of my colleagues, and it is certainly strongly mine. We do not, however, believe that it is a matter for the criminal law.

I will deal briefly with the Auld report and the economic effects before I come to the question of compromises and the handling of the matter in the House. I have looked at the various predictions in the Auld report and elsewhere about the economic effects of deregulation. I think that it is fair to conclude that, as the assumptions are so varied, it would be foolish to claim certainty. Our surveys suggest that under 30 per cent. of shops would open all the year round, which apparently compares with just under 20 per cent. in Scotland, where there is no law against it. I believe that, as in Scotland, there would be plenty of volunteers to man those shops which opened.

One of the merits of the Auld report is that it did not claim that all the arguments went the same way. There is certainly a balance to be struck. There can be no certainty about the net effect on sales and thus on jobs, as these will depend on the free choice of the customer. All that one can be sure about is that the law in its present state produces uncertainty and unfairness, which can only be harmful.

Mr. Eric Forth (Mid-Worcestershire): Will my right hon. Friend confirm that the incidence of church-going in Scotland is higher than in England and that to his knowledge there has been no breakdown of civilisation north of the border of the type predicted by those who oppose the Bill?

Mr. Hurd: Civilisation seems to be strong and flourishing north of the border. The Scottish Sunday, about which one may have varying views, is preserved by tradition and example. That seems to me to be a sounder basis than that on which we rely in England and Wales.

I should like to say something about experience abroad. If I do not, others certainly will. Many countries have some form of regulation of Sunday shopping and several are having the same kind of debate as is going on here. We have done a trawl around, and I think it is fair to say that there is a trend towards more flexible shopping hours. In some cases, that has been recognised by legislative change, while in others a debate is going on. In others, illegal trade is increasing.

Norway started on the same course as we are following but was pushed by a minority campaign into a compromise solution with a local option and a schedule of goods. I am told that that compromise is not going particularly well. Sweden, on the other hand, introduced complete deregulation, and I gather that there is no particular demand for the reimposition of control. The reason may be that, as I understand it, the decline in small shops has been halted in Sweden. That suggests that deregulation can help small shops by enabling them to play to their strengths, which are flexibility and quality of service.

In the United States of America, seven-day trading is allowed in most states, and I know of no evidence that deregulation has been harmful to small shops there.

Sir Raymond Gower (Vale of Glamorgan): Why does my right hon. Friend keep looking at the smaller countries, such as Sweden and Norway? Is it not a fact that all the thickly populated countries, such as France, West Germany and Holland, have great restrictions on Sunday trading?

Mr. Hurd: In differing respects that is so, but many of the restrictions are now subject to argument, especially in Germany. One may also have views about the extent to which those restrictions are enforced. The last "small country" to which I referred was in fact the United States of America.

At a meeting in a church in my constituency on this subject one of the very last contributors was a grey-haired lady who was a warden of one of the churches in Witney. My heart sank, as she looked like a formidable opponent of the Bill—there was that feel about her—but she simply remarked that, having lived for many years in the United States, the main difference that she had observed in this respect was that in the United States the shops were open and the churches were full.

Sir Peter Mills (Torridge and Devon, West): Is my right hon. Friend really saying that complete deregulation will not affect small shopkeepers in this country? The big multiples are gaining in strength and they will open on Sundays. As there is only a certain amount of cake to go round, small shopkeepers will be drastically hurt.

Mr. Hurd: I said that it would be foolish to be dogmatic in this respect. I have referred to the Swedish experience. If my hon. Friend has information which contradicts my analysis of that experience, no doubt he will produce it. My analysis is that deregulation has actually helped to end the decline in prosperity of small shopkeepers.

Mr. Duffy rose——

Mr. Hurd: I should like to get on a little as I am coming to what may be a particular issue in view of the interventions of my hon. Friends.

Mr. Duffy: What about taking an intervention from this side?

Mr. Hurd: I have taken one from that side.

Mr. Duffy: He has gone.

Mr. Hurd: I am not responsible for that. I think that I have been reasonably generous in giving way.

With regard to the third option that I set out—those within and outside the House who broadly accept my critique of the 1950 Act but dislike the Bill and argue strongly that the Government should be able to devise some compromise between the existing law and the deregulation proposed in the Bill—I think that Members who hold that view will agree that it is not simply a matter of splitting the difference, nor can the matter be resolved by the ingenuity of the parliamentary draftsmen. Before the draftsmen can get to work, there must be some principle on which a compromise can rest if it is to be fair, acceptable and enforceable.

Many suggestions along those lines were put to the Auld Committee and in another place. I think that they fall under four main headings. First, there are the proposals for some form of local option involving local councillors in some way, despite their strong opposition to becoming involved and the complications and contradictions that would result. Secondly, there are proposals for a compromise on the hours of opening permitted on Sundays. Thirdly, there are proposals to extend but not abolish the list of commodities which can legally be sold on a Sunday, although I think that that would be difficult. Fourthly, there are proposals to limit in one way or another the size of establishment which may open on a Sunday. Under those four main headings, a large array of compromise proposals has been set out.

I do not wish to analyse those proposals today. I wish to make one or two general comments which I hope will be found reasonable. It is desirable that a measure touching Sunday should be as widely accepted as possible within and outside the House. So far, the Government have not been persuaded that any compromise of which we have heard is preferable to the Bill, but we intend to enter discussion of the Bill in detail with an open mind. [Interruption.] It did not require much intelligence to anticipate the scepticism with which that statement would be received. I therefore come at once to the specific arrangements whereby we believe that the general thoughts that I have just uttered can be made effective.

As we are persuaded that the present provisions will not work, we invite our supporters to join us in voting to repeal those unworkable provisions, but neither my right hon. Friend the Patronage Secretary nor I would wish or expect that invitation to result in Members voting against their consciences. If the Bill receives a Second Reading, my right hon. Friend the Patronage Secretary will, in Committee and on Report, underline our open approach by doing his best to encourage attendance and then by arranging for Conservative Members to have a free vote on amendments.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Hurd: I should like to complete this point before giving way. We would not seek to upset in another place any alternative approach that had commended itself on a free vote to this House.

Mr. Robin Maxwell-Hyslop (Tiverton): Does my right hon. Friend's memory extend as far back as 27 February this year, when, on a free vote on the Procedure Committee's recommendations, the will of the Back Benchers was overturned by Ministers and PPSs who traipsed through the Lobby to do so? Does he recall that less than a week ago the Leader of the House explained this phenomenon by saying that Ministers looked to the Chief Whip for advice on a free vote and that PPSs are expected to do likewise?

Mr. Hurd: I have no direct memory of the incident, but I can readily and without equivocation put my hon. Friend's fears at rest. The freedom of the vote in Committee and on Report will be undiluted and unaffected in respect of all Conservative Members—right hon. or hon. Members of the Government or not.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Hurd: I shall give way only once more.

Mr. Charles Irving (Cheltenham): Having listened with care, am I to understand that there will also be a free vote on Third Reading?

Mr. Hurd: The Bill that will reach Third Reading will be the Bill as formed by the House on a series of free votes. It will be the House's Bill as a result of a series of free votes.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Hurd: We would propose that the Bill be referred first to a Special Standing Committee.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Hurd: I shall not give way, as I intend to conclude in a few minutes—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the Secretary of State does not give way, hon. Members must resume their seats.

Mr. Hurd: When I gave way to my hon. Friend the Member for Cheltenham (Mr. Irving), I said that I was just about to conclude.

Mr. Ted Rowlands (Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. We have been following the Secretary of State very closely throughout the discussions about whether or not there will be a free vote. Can we, through you, have a guarantee that at no stage will he seek to move a guillotine on the Bill?

Mr. Speaker: I cannot answer that.

Mr. Hurd: I gladly give that guarantee — [HON. MEMBERS: "Oh."] We would propose that the Bill be referred to a Special Standing Committee. That will give the bodies and interests involved a clear opportunity to put forward their proposals for building, if they so wish, on the ground that the repeal of the 1950 Act would leave clear. I certainly hope that the critics of the Bill will welcome this opportunity to move from criticism to construction.

Mr. Ivor Stanbrook (Orpington): Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Hurd: No. I am coming to the end.

I have noticed the instruction, standing in the name of my hon. Friend the Member for Boothferry (Sir P. Bryan), which calls on the Government to amend the Bill

"to give statutory recognition to the special character of Sunday."

The Bill has always included special arrangements for Sunday in respect of employment, and it will continue to do so after its passage through another place. Therefore, in that respect, it already complies with the views of my hon. Friend in the draft instruction. In Committee and on Report we can consider further whether special arrangements can also sensibly be made in the first part of the Bill. The question is not whether Sunday should be kept special but what precisely should be the role of the law in that regard. I hope that the House will agree that the arrangements that I have outlined give hon. Members a reasonable chance to test thoroughly all possible alternatives to the simple proposal for deregulation. I repeat that we would not try to reverse any such alternative approach that commended itself to the House on a free vote.

Mr. Stanbrook: Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Hurd: I am just concluding.

First, we need to clear the ground by a straightforward decision on Second Reading that the present Act will not do. The ground must be cleared before we can decide whether to leave the ground as an open space or to erect some other building. If we fail this first test and the House tonight decides to leave the law as it is, I foresee a good deal of indignation from the wider public and a spasm of arbitrary prosecutions under the 1950 Act, from which traders and public alike would suffer. Later, I foresee a steady further collapse of the Act into disrepute.

The truth is that the law is in decay, and that is bad for us all — for shoppers, shopkeepers and all our constituents. I believe that the course that I have outlined shows us the way to restore the law to effectiveness and good health.

Mr. Gerald Kaufman (Manchester, Gorton): This debate has been heralded by an unprecedented outbreak of largesse on the part of the Government. There has been an outpouring of goodies, which when carefully examined appropriately fit in nicely with the nostaglic old slogan of one of the Bill's commercial supporters, F. W. Woolworth —"Nothin worth more than sixpence."

We have the generous extension of the debate until midnight. Is it unworthy of me to wonder whether it has crossed the mind of the Patronage Secretary that as midnight approaches some of his frailer Back Benchers may find the lure of a mug of Horlicks and bed more enticing than the attraction of the "No" Lobby?

There is a motion to commit the Bill to a Special Standing Committee—a procedure rarely granted despite the most earnest pleas on even uncontroversial Bills, but now supplied on this Bill for nothing. I ask myself whether the Government are worried about something. I ask that question even more on hearing the Home Secretary solemnly offering his Back Benchers a free vote on some of the remaining stages of the Bill if only they will vote for the Second Reading tonight. Any fly accepting the spider's invitation will have complete freedom of the web.

The Home Secretary's offer of a free vote is only worth while and meaningful if his hon. Friends vote against the Second Reading in numbers ample enough to gain substantial representation on the Standing Committee. That way, with a Committee not packed with Lobby fodder, the free vote will mean something, especially in the light of the promise by the Home Secretary that the guillotine will not apply at any stage of the Bill. No doubt sufficient hon. Members on the Government side will take the hint when the Division bells ring at midnight, and they can have complete confidence that voting against the Bill is in no way a violation of the three-line Whip that was issued to them.

I offer as proof a letter printed recently in British Weekly and Christian Record, a journal published by Christian Weekly Newspapers Ltd. In reply to a reader who demanded that there should be no Whip on this Bill for Government Members, a correspondent wrote in a letter:

"Mr. Roberts"

—that is the person who wrote the original letter—

"misunderstands the nature and power of the parliamentary Whips, at least as far as the Conservative Party is concerned. The Whip is issued to the Conservative MPs who agree to take it, essentially as a bidding to attend the House of Commons and to be present for voting.

How the MPs then vote remains very much a matter of their own judgment and conscience."

That letter, specifically written about the Bill, came from a most respected Member of this House, the right hon. Member for Selby (Mr. Alison), who is the Parliamentary Private Secretary to the Prime Minister. I have spent some time in 10 Downing street, and I know it is inconceivable that such a letter by the Prime Minister's Parliamentary Private Secretary could have been written without the knowledge and authority of the Prime Minister herself. Therefore, hon. Members on the Government side can be confident and carefree in voting tonight in accordance with what the right hon. Member for Selby calls

"their own judgment and conscience."

Regardless of one's view of the intentions of the Bill, in the form in which it is before the House it is unfit to proceed further because in the literal meaning of the word it is nonsense. As amended in the House of Lords, clause 2 maintains the Shops Act 1950, which provides protection for all workers in the retail trade but schedule 2, which has not been amended, removes the Shops Act 1950 protection from all except 16 and 17-year-olds. Page 1 does almost the exact opposite of pages 5 to 7. The Home Secretary has nurtured a reputation for seeing both sides of the question, but surely this is carrying broad mindedness a little too far. The right hon. Gentleman really wants to restore the Bill to the state that it was in before Lord Denning and Lord Stockton interfered with it, by withdrawing Shops Act protection from most workers. That is one of the major reasons why the Opposition ask the House to reject the Bill.

The Auld report makes it clear that the first Bills enacted by Parliament which related to shops

"had their origin in the late nineteenth century concern to protect shop workers from exploitation."

I suppose that that is what some people might call Victorian values. Shop workers needed protection a century ago, and today's 2 million shop workers, one in 10 of the working population, need protection just as much. They remain some of the most disadvantaged employees in Britain. Shop workers are a vulnerable work force. About 63 per cent. are women, two thirds of them married women, and 21 per cent. are 19 years of age or younger. About 15 per cent. of male workers are 19 or younger. Three fifths of the women work part time, and part-timers are disproportionately numerous among the younger workers. Of Saturday-only workers, 75 per cent. are under 18. Two thirds of them are girls and 87 per cent. are under 21.

The Auld report highlighted the predicament of shop workers when, speaking of those large numbers of workers whose employers have resisted trade union organisation, it said:

"They lack the trades union protection enjoyed by most other workers. In the main, shop workers have to fend for themselves on the subject of working hours and conditions."

The Auld report emphasised that shop workers work longer hours and receive below average pay. The national minimum wage rate for employees in the non-food retail trades is only £75·52 a week. For those in the retail food and allied trades it is even lower, £75·14 a week. Earnings of women shop workers are only half the national average earnings for women.

It is because of this special disadvantage that for much of this cenury Governments of all parties have agreed that shop workers should be given special protection. The reasons for that special protection were eloquently stated by Winston Churchill just before he became Home Secretary when, in 1909, he moved the Second Reading of the Trade Boards Bill, which launched the wages councils. [Interruption.] I am not sure whether hon. Gentlemen are sneering at workers' conditions or at Winston Churchill: it is up to them to decide.

When Winston Churchill moved the Second Reading of the Trade Boards Bill he said:

"where you have what we call sweated trades, you have no organisation, no parity of bargaining, the good employer is undercut by the bad, and the bad employer is undercut by the worst; the worker, whose whole livelihood depends upon the industry, is undersold by the worker who only takes the trade up as a second string."

That is relevant in a trade with so many part-timers. As President of the Board of Trade, Winston Churchill also said:

"It is a serious national evil that any class of His Majesty's subjects should receive less than a living wage in return for their utmost exertions."—[Official Report, 28 April 1909; Vol. IV, c. 388.]

I suppose that what Mr. Churchill was really saying was that one cannot build caring capitalism on exploited labour. From Churchill's legislation there developed the wages councils.

We heard a lot from the Home Secretary today, and from his predecessor in the debate last year, about the impartial recommendation of the independent Auld committee that restrictions on the hours of shop opening should be removed. The Auld committee made other recommendations as well, and its members felt so strongly that they put those other recommendations forward even though, as they emphasised, the subject

"was not directly within our terms of reference."

They said:

"We strongly urge the retention for retail workers of the machinery of the Wages Councils for the fixing and proper enforcement of satisfactory wages and premium rates."

They added:

"We set great store by the preservation of the role of Wages Councils in fixing statutory minimum weekly rates, holidays and holiday pay for the retail trades. Shop workers need their protection in this respect as much as ever, in fact more so now when jobs are harder to find and the already low membership of unions in the retail sector is declining."

The Auld committee went on to say:

"we believe that there will be a strong likelihood of exploitation of some shop workers in the form of lower wages, particularly for unsocial hours of work, and possibly in a longer working week."

That is why it recommended the retention of the wages councils for those three matters. However, the Wages Bill now going through Parliament removes from the wages councils those very powers whose retention the Auld committee said that it set great store by—the powers to fix statutory weekly rates, holidays and holiday pay. The Auld committee said that, as part of deregulation, they should stay, but the Paymaster General is abolishing them in the Wages Bill.

The Auld committee made another recommendation:

"we also urge that there should be proper enforcement of the Wages Councils Orders, by adequately staffed Wages Council Inspectorate. This would become an even greater necessity in the event of de-regulation than it is now."

Since 1979 the Wages Inspectorate has already been cut by nearly one-third and now the Government intend to reduce it by a further 40 per cent. While the Government have accepted those Auld recommendations that suit them —deregulation and repeal of Shops Act protection—the two Auld recommendations that are an integral part of the package have been cast aside. For all workers under 21, a high proportion of shopworkers, the wages councils are being scrapped. The number of shopworkers aged under 21 totals 500,000. About one in three of young people find their first jobs in the distributive and related trades, yet the Government are repealing their wages council protection.

It has to be said that the Government are completely schizophrenic in their attitude to young shop workers. On the one hand they are determined to deprive all under-21s of even residuary wages council protection, and on the other they want to retain Shops Act protection only for 16 and 17-year-olds. I hope that I may be excused for claiming to see in this some logical inconsistency—it is what they call the generation gap.

A major gap in the Home Secretary's speech was his failure to state clearly what the Government intend to do about Shops Act protection. Their original intention was to remove it entirely for all except certain teenagers, and part of the Bill still embodies that intention. This afternoon the Home Secretary was even more obscure than usual about whether the Government intend to maintain their original intention. If they go through with it, they will be depriving most shop workers of entitlements to halfday holidays and meal breaks, and of the necessary protection for restrictions of working hours.

The Bill will enable shops to open for 24 hours a day, for seven days a week and for 168 hours a week, but under it shop workers will have no legal protection against disciplinary action or dismissal if they refuse to work late at night. What is more, the wages council legislation will give them no right to receive premium rates for unsocial hours. The Bill gives shops the unlimited right to open for all 24 hours on Sunday. Removal of the Shops Act protection would deprive workers of the right to have time off in lieu of Sunday working, which would abolish the statutory limitation that prevents Sunday opening for more than two Sundays in a month. Worst of all, the Bill will result in forcing all shop workers to work on Sundays whether or not they want to.

The Home Secretary made great play of the provisions in clause 3 and schedule 1, which seem to give existing workers the right to refuse to work on Sunday and not to be dismissed or disciplined if they exercise that right, but even this alleged protection is almost worthless. The unfair dismissal procedure cited in schedule 1(1) is a pallid protection. Even if a victimised worker makes such a complaint, the records show that only 4 per cent. of those who are successful get their jobs back. Employers, who in any case will have the weapon of refusal of promotion and of the opportunity of pleading genuine economic reason or the needs of the business, will not be deterred by this paper proviso.

Moreover, employers are even now planning to circumvent the provision. Schedule 1 makes it clear that this so-called conscience clause does not apply when the worker has signed an agreement to work on Sundays, and that exemption, which makes nonsense of the alleged safeguard, specifically applies after the Act comes into force. Employers are preparing for the new situation already. I have here a job application form issued by Harris Queensway plc. Among the other declarations it asks applicants to sign is this one:

"I agree to work on Bank Holidays, Sundays and overtime as required."

Mr. Charles Morrison (Devizes): When was that prospectus first published? Is it brand new, or has it been in existence for some time?

Mr. Kaufman: I cannot tell the hon. Gentleman because——

Mr. Neil Hamilton (Tatton): Ah!

Mr. Kaufman: I know that the hon. Gentleman is anxious for a job, but he should not creep every moment of the afternoon.

The form is extant now, many months before the Bill is likely to become law, if it ever does, and those who take jobs now are being asked to sign that form. In any case, this conscience clause, for the little that it is worth, applies only to workers in employment at the time that the Act comes into force. All others will have to work on Sundays, whether or not they like it.

Mr. Neil Hamilton: They are queueing up for jobs.

Mr. Kaufman: They are queueing up for jobs because there are 4 million unemployed.

All others will have to work on Sundays whether or not they like it, and that will mean that in time all workers will be forced to work on Sundays. The turnover of workers in the retail trade is enormous. One survey shows that 34 per cent. of full-time shop workers and 45 per cent. of part-timers have been in their current jobs for less than a year.

What will be the consequence of the removal of limits on Sunday opening? It will mean fewer jobs. This is made clear in the Auld report, which states:

[Mr. Kaufman]

"Sunday opening would generate Sunday jobs, but the resulting fall in week-day demand would mean fewer jobs at other times. In the short term, the IFS"—

the Institute of Fiscal Studies, which did a survey for the Auld committee—

"suggests that the net effect of these two conflicting influences on manning requirements would be a small reduction in employment in the retail trade, possibly about 5,000 full-time equivalent jobs . . . In the longer term, the reduction in retailing capacity would inevitably involve a further loss of jobs. Although more people might be required in the remaining shops, the IFS predicts that the net effect would be a reduction of about a further 15,000 full-time equivalent jobs."

That gloomy estimate is confirmed by a letter sent to me last month by Mr. Peter Hartley, executive chairman of Hillards plc. He wrote to me as follows:

"Hillards is a public limited company operating over forty large superstores and supermarkets in ten Northern and Midland counties. We employ over 6,500 people.

We have done our sums and calculate that if we trade on Sundays we shall provide additional part-time jobs for between 800 and 1,000 people. Most of these jobs will be for young people and housewives and will be for Sunday work only. We further anticipate that we shall increase our total sales because we shall take additional trade from many small businesses and corner shops that currently open on a Sunday in defiance of the law.

However, our total operating costs are likely to increase significantly more than the extra profit which will be generated from these additional sales and as a result we shall have to employ between 100-300 less people full time during the week.

So in one medium sized company (with sales of around £300 million) we provide up to 1,000 jobs for five or six hours on a Sunday but dispense with up to 300 jobs of 39 hours during the week.

In areas of already high unemployment this cannot make sense.

I have been asked by several Conservative Members of Parliament why should Hillards open on Sundays if they do not want to? That seems to be an odd question from a party which believes in competition and market forces"—[Interruption.]

This is a man who employs 6,500 people and has a chain of stores with a turnover of £300 million. I should have thought that his opinion was worth listening to. He goes on to say:

"If the law is changed we shall be forced to open on a Sunday and instead of creating full time jobs (we provided over 1,000 new jobs in the last year) we shall have to add to the numbers of those who are unemployed."

As Mr. Hartley states, Sunday opening will have a harmful effect on small shops. The Auld report reminds us that original legislation limiting shop opening hours was passed "to protect small shopkeepers from excessive competition."

If the Bill is enacted, many retail chains which are against Sunday opening will all the same feel obliged to open. The John Lewis Partnership states:

"Sunday opening would be progressive and irresistible."

Mr. Nicholas Lyell (Mid-Bedfordshire): I am most grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for giving way. Is he aware that practically every shop, large and small, which trades on Sunday is trading illegally? Would it be the policy of the Labour party to enforce the present law?

Mr. Kaufman: It is not the job of a political party, or indeed the Government, to enforce the law, and the hon. and learned Gentleman, who is the Parliamentary Private Secretary to the Attorney-General, shows a great ignorance of what the law says.

The Association of Retail Trades has surveyed its members and found that 82 per cent. of small traders are opposed to deregulation. If the Bill is passed, many small traders will have to stay open seven days a week in order to survive. Many more will be driven out of business altogether. Is the Government's objective really to make Britain a land fit for superstore chains to rake in monopoly profits?

Sunday opening will be financially costly. The Association of County Councils states that the additional costs to the trading standards service alone will be £3·5 million, and that would be for only a skeleton service. There would also be the cost of checking additional fire precautions, the additional cost to private industry of discontinuing the present practice of carrying out road works on Sundays, extra costs of garbage disposal, extra costs of trying to ensure that children are not exploited as cheap Sunday labour, and extra costs of policing.

The chief constable of South Yorkshire says that Sunday opening

"will inevitably increase the policing costs and cause additional workload for foot patrol officers."

It is the considered view of the Association of Chief Police Officers that Sunday opening will increase crime. Mr. Brian Hayes, the chief constable of Surrey, and the secretary of that association, states:

"police presence on Sundays might need to be increased and the current practice of minimum manning would need to be re-assessed. Parking regulations would require major revision to incorporate Sundays, as many"—[Interruption.]

—this is the chief constable of Surrey; he may know a little more than do hon. Gentlemen about policing—

"Parking regulatiions would require major revision to incorporate Sundays, as many existing regulations do not apply after 6.30 pm on Saturdays. The increased restrictions would then need to be enforced . . . Longer opening hours would provide increased opportunities for persons, particularly juveniles, to commit offences of theft, and there could be an increased risk to shop staff, especially female, who are required to take cash to the bank or to travel home during the hours of darkness. There is also a possibility of an increase in offences of public disorder, criminal damage and violence if late night shoppers come into contact with early evening drinkers."

The Paymaster General and Minister for Employment (Mr. Kenneth Clarke): The right hon. Gentleman is opposing the repeal of the present legislation, and, most untypically for him, he did not answer the question of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Mid-Bedfordshire (Mr. Lyle). Is it his opinion that the chief constables of Surrey and elsewhere should begin a drive to enforce the present criminal law against the many shops, large and small, the garages and others, which at the moment are trading illegally?

Mr. Kaufman: The right hon. and learned Gentleman is also a lawyer. He is unaware of the fact that it is not the job of the chief constable of Surrey to do that; it is the job of the local authorities. The right hon. and learned Gentleman had better stick to explaining why he is putting through Parliament a Bill which will take away the wages council protection which the Auld committee says should be retained.

Mr. Clarke: I entirely concede that the right hon. Gentleman was correct in correcting me. It is for the local authorities to enforce the law. Many of those local authorities are Labour controlled. Now will he stop retreating into pedantry and answer the question? Is it the opinion of the Opposition that the local authorities should begin a drive to enforce the present law, and is that the basis upon which he is opposing the Bill's Second Reading? [HON. MEMBERS: "Answer."]

Mr. Kaufman: I shall answer. I am grateful to the right hon. and learned Gentleman for acknowledging that Labour local authorities can be expected to enforce the law, whereas Conservative authorities presumably cannot.

Mr. Nicholas Fairbairn (Perth and Kinross) rose——

Mr. Kaufman: We believe that the law should be enforced and respected, and we believe also that that should be done by Woolworth as much as by the National Union of Mineworkers.

Mr. Tony Baldry (Banbury): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Kaufman: No, enough is enough.

Sunday opening could change the character of Sunday. That is accepted by the Auld committee, which admitted:

"There can be no doubt . . . that widespread opening of shops on Sundays would affect the traditional character of the day very much more profoundly than the opening of cinemas, concert halls and theatres, or the holding of sporting events. The change would be likely to affect far more people in the way that they spend their Sundays, and would have a significant effect on the feel of the day."

Mr. Fairbairn rose——

Mr. Baldry rose——

Mr. Kaufman: Last week the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster gave a notable address at St. James Church, Piccadilly. Some of that address, as one might have expected, was controversial, other parts were almost canonical. Indeed, on reading the text I had the feeling that the right hon. Gentleman was putting in his claim for the next bishopric that falls open. In his speech the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster called for a return to traditional values of decency and order. That call must have struck a chord with many people. He called for the "strengthening of the sense of personal obligations, most notably within families."

He declared that many of our miseries

"derive in great part from family disintegration and its causes —which are often spiritual and moral, not material."

Many people of the right hon. Gentleman's party, of other parties and of no party, may have agreed with him. How, then, can the Government of which he is a leading member introduce a Bill which could weaken family life and lead to family disintegration?

Mr. Robert Walker of Sears, a company which owns many large stores, including Selfridges, Lewis's and Mappin and Webb, said three days ago of the Bill:

"Most of the staff is made up of women and most of those women are married. We feel it is hard enough for people with families to work on Saturdays, and if they have to work on Sundays it will be very hard indeed."

The Family Policy Studies Centre estimates that if no more than half the shops opened on Sundays 350,000 shop workers would be required. These would include 94,000 mothers and 35,000 fathers. About 750,000 children would not be with their mothers and fathers for all or part of Sunday. The Bill will lead to many latchkey children being left unsuperivised and alone for long periods.

In response to a survey, nearly three quarters of married shop workers and a majority of unmarried shop workers thought that Sunday work would harm their family life. Of the married shop workers, 48 per cent. said that Sunday was the only day when their spouse was also off work. Of single shop workers who live at home, most of whom are teenagers, 56 per cent. found that Sunday was usually the only day that they could spend with their father. For 46 per cent. the same was true in relation to their mother. On the other days, either they or their parents were at work.

Some hon. Members listening to me may ask, "What is it to do with him?" It is undoubtedly true that Sunday is not my Sabbath, but I do know something about the Sabbath. My father was a Jewish immigrant from Poland. He was a factory worker all of his life. He never earned much of a wage. He had a large and growing family to house, clothe and feed, but whatever it meant to his employment and promotion prospects he would never accept a job which required him to work on his Sabbath. In the jobs which he did obtain, regardless of the effect on his wages, he resisted all pressures to make him work on his Sabbath. For him, in his hard-working and often toilsome life, the Sabbath was held precious as a tranquil island in the stormy sea of the week. That is how many millions of people in this country feel about Sunday. If I respected my father for his defence of his Sabbath, must I not equally respect those millions who wish to defend their Sunday? The Prime Minister takes pride in being a conviction politician. It is, indeed, admirable to be a person of conviction. It is equally admirable to remember that other people have convictions. It is admirable to respect the convictions of others as much as one cherishes one's own.

The convictions of many about the Bill are embodied in a statement made recently by Cardinal Hume, who said:

"We must beware lest the principle prevail that the market should rule supreme seven days a week. Our principle is that there is more to being human than supply and demand; there is more to social life than trading and commerce."

The bafflement of many was voiced by Lord Stockton, when he said:

"this Bill . . . is saying that because it is impossible to please or satisfy some opinions, and in order to please some strange new doctrine of liberalisation, we should adopt all the worst elements of liberal Victorian tradition, which has somehow infiltrated my old party like some kind of disease."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 21 January 1986; Vol. 470, c. 159.]

The warning of many was contained in a recent leading article in the Daily Telegraph, which declared:

"measures which outrage the deep feelings of large sections of the community and command the enthusiastic support only of doctrinaires and a few large commercial institutions do not make good politics . . . democracy is ill-served by inflexible politicians who are insensitive to public feeling."

Yes, the law is illogical and would benefit from reform, but that does not mean that this sweeping and uncompromising Bill, and only this Bill, is the answer. It does not mean that one set of convictions must trample underfoot a differing set of convictions and hold them for nothing.

This country has evolved into the greatest democracy in the world, not by absolutism and dogmatism, but by Governments using their tempering power to accommodate and reconcile clashing and conflicting convictions. The outcome is often compromise — and sometimes untidy compromise. But our democracy is built on the foundation of a myriad of untidy compromises. That is how we live with each other. The ability to live with each other in harmony is the true test of democracy.

Even at this late stage I advise the Government to withdraw the Bill. I advise them to call a conference of all interests — the Churches, trade unions, retailers, small and large, and the parties represented in the House — and try to work out an agreed change in the law that would be widely acceptable. That would be the sensible way.

[Mr. Kaufman]

That would be the way that our country usually works. If the Government are adamant against that way, I call on hon. Members in all parts of the House to vote against the Bill tonight.

5.7 pm

Mr. Francis Pym (Cambridgeshire, South-East): The Bill did not make any contribution to the large majority that my party achieved at the last general election. Indeed, no mention of it was made during the campaign and, so far as I know, little or no thought was given to the topic. The irony is that it is now evident that the Government need their large majority to get the Bill through.

Tonight's motion should have been on a free vote. I asked my right hon. Friend the Patronage Secretary as long ago as last autumn to allow a free vote. The Government are not prepared to allow a free vote and have chosen instead a three-line Whip on Second Reading, accompanied by the undertaking of free votes thereafter in Committee and on Report. That is an unusual device, to say the least, and might serve the needs of some of my right hon. and hon. Friends, but I think that it is a contradiction.

The vote on Second Reading relates to the principle of the Bill. That principle is deregulation. If one is against that principle, as I am, I do not see how in honour or in conscience I can do other than vote against it. If amendments are carried later to introduce some controls and limitations which are not now in the Bill, the principle of deregulation to which the Government attach such importance will be altered. That is a contradiction. I regard the steps that the Government have taken to try to get the Bill through its Second Reading as a moral victory for their opponents.

There is another unusual aspect of the handling of the Bill—the way in which the Government have directed their publicity campaign to justify pressing on with the Bill. That campaign blames the opponents for not coming forward with recommendations that would get the Government out of their own difficulties. But we, the opponents to the Bill as it stands, did not introduce the Bill. The Government introduced it. The Government have the enthusiasm and responsibility for it. They cannot absolve themselves from that responsibility, let alone blame anyone else for the difficulties that they face. Ministers thought that they could bend enough arms to get the Bill through, and maybe they can, but the dislike of it is widespread, and I wonder why it is being forced on the British people. The existing law is unsatisfactory—we are all agreed about that—but deregulation is not the only remedy. Plenty of other remedies are available, and my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary mentioned several this afternoon. As he said, all of them have disadvantages, but there are also disadvantages in deregulation. The Bill is offensive and distasteful to many people, yet the Government brush that aside.

Mr. Fairbairn: My right hon. Friend seems to think that this measure is being forced upon the British people; it is not. The Scots have always had deregulation. When the right hon. Gentleman was in high office, did he ever attempt to have deregulation removed from us Calvinists so that we would not suffer, as he opposes the English being given their liberty?

Mr. Pym: I am grateful to my hon. and learned Friend; I stand corrected. "The British people" is not the correct description; it would be more accurate to refer to the people of England, Wales and Northern Ireland. [Interruption.] I mean England and Wales.

It is hard to argue that the need for this change, as envisaged in the Bill, is urgent or crucial. At times Governments have to take unpopular action for some overriding need or in the national interest. This Bill, however, is not in that category and should not be treated as though it were. There is logic in the Government's argument that the law is not being obeyed in some cases and is difficult to enforce. The existing arrangement for Sunday trading is not the only example of that sort. It would have been wiser to find a better solution to the problem before legislating in a way that so many people dislike. In a matter of this kind, affecting the social life of our country, there should be a much wider degree of consent in the nation than exists on this measure.

A comparison has been made with the situation in Scotland, which has been prayed in aid. I believe that tradition and ethos in Scotland have been, are, and always will be, different. In particular, Scotland has a deeply rooted and much stronger tradition in relation to Sundays than exists in England today, so the circumstances are different.

Mr. Fairbairn: Rubbish!

Mr. Pym: Well, I think they are different. The free arrangement in Scotland would have a different effect in England if applied here. That point is behind the argument used by some members of the Church of Scotland for saying that they themselves dislike the passage of this Bill.

Some of my right hon. and hon. Friends believe that people are deprived of some freedom because Sunday is not like any other day, but it has been unlike any other day since creation, and long may it remain so. The Government believe that Sunday, or the Sabbath, will still be different even after the passage of this Bill. To the extent that it will still be the day on which some people go to church, it will be different. Many families will try to keep it special; no doubt many will succeed. But for many families, to do this will be difficult and perhaps impossible, especially those living near shopping centres or those who find that a member or members of the family have to work on Sundays when they do not want to work. This will apply particularly to shopkeepers who want to remain closed on Sundays but who find themselves forced by competition to open or else lose their livelihood. What a painful position in which to put people in the name of freedom!

In trying to get the Bill through, the Government probably believe that some intolerable constraints that now exist will be lifted, and that the freedom to shop anywhere for anything on Sunday will bring joy and happiness to everyone. I believe that things will work out differently and that many people will regret the change. The character of Sunday will be altered, not necessarily immediately, but over a time. Over time, I fear that the change will have a much greater effect than the Government believe and one that the nation will live to regret. The Government no doubt believe that the Bill will liberate and enrich our lives. I share such admirable intentions, but I believe that the Bill and the method in it for effecting the change, far from enriching our lives, will ultimately impoverish them. That is why I will vote against the Bill.

5.16 pm

Mr. Donald Stewart (Western Isles): I support what the right hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, South-East (Mr. Pym) said about the Scottish situation, and I shall come to that matter. The right hon. Gentleman also raised an important point which, as legislators, we should seriously consider—that there is no mandate for this change. At the last two general elections the manifesto of the Conservative party has not mentioned any promise or intention to carry out such a revolutionary change as is proposed in the Bill in the pattern of life in the United Kingdom. The Government therefore have no right to proceed with it.

The other day the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster referred to the misfortunes which had befallen the United Kingdom as a result of the legislation which produced the permissive society. I agree with a large part of that charge, but I would be much happier if he or the Government would say what legislation they propose to reverse the permissive society. Incidentally, the right hon. Gentleman referred, in passing, to the trumpet sounding an uncertain note. His remarks would have been more impressive if he had quoted correctly. Unfortunately, there is nothing uncertain about the Government's attitude to the Bill. A measure which most people would regard as involving a matter of conscience will be steamrollered through the House by a three-line Whip. I believe that that is an innovation which the Government will live to regret. To some extent, what the Conservative party does is its own affair. The Secretary of State for Scotland claimed that the Government had come to the Bill with an open mind, but in fact his failure to agree to a free vote on Second Reading shows the extent of the Government's open mind on the Bill.

We have heard a great deal about the Auld report. The Auld committee took no evidence from Scotland, so the report does not cover the Scottish situation. Several companies, including Marks and Spencer, have announced that if the Bill becomes law they will open branches in Scotland, so there is a keen interest in that country in what will follow the passing of this legislation. It is a fact that when the original legislation covering England and Wales was passed no legal prohibitions were required in Scotland, for the very reason mentioned by the right hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, South-East. There are other restraints on Sunday trading in Scotland, where there is also greater respect for the preservation of the Sabbath.

Another fact is that in Scotland there is often no need for central Government statutes to preserve the Sabbath. Many firms are permitted to open under local authority byelaws. It is not uncommon for such byelaws to demand that there shall be no trading on Sunday, so it has not been necessary in many places for Scotland to go to the central Government for legislation to preserve the Sabbath.

It is not true that one can go along the high street of a Scottish town on a Sunday and listen to cash registers tinkling away merrily. There is no demand for the Bill. I have previously challenged hon. Members to say whether their postbags were heavy with letters from constituents complaining of inconvenience or suffering as a result of the lack of such legislation, and not one could do so.

On 3 March, when the hon. Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvels) asked the Prime Minister how many representations she and the Government had received about the Bill, she replied that there were 800 in favour and about 40,000 against.

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. David Waddington): Perhaps I might bring the right hon. Gentleman up to date. It is obvious that those who support the Bill were a little slow getting off the mark. The score is now 20,736 letters in favour and 47,000 against, and there are more names on petitions in favour of the Bill than on petitions opposing it.

Mr Stewart rose——

Mrs. Elaine Kellett-Bowman (Lancaster): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Stewart: I am replying to an intervention. I see that the Government have been working on their Back Benchers and in the country, but the figures are still quite instructive and make nonsense of the Home Secretary's statement.

Mrs. Kellett-Bowman: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Stewart: Be quiet.

Even the Minister's figures make nonsense of the Home Secretary's claim that there would be wide public indignation if the Bill failed. I believe that the exact opposite is the case.

The Auld report says in paragraph 66:

"It would, however, be misleading to leave the impression that there is an incessant general clamour for Sunday shopping or longer trading hours. Most people, even those who work full-time, do manage to buy what they need in the permitted times."

A Harris poll, which covered England, Wales and Scotland, found that only 5 per cent. could answer, "A lot" and that 67 per cent. answered "Not at all," when asked:

"Are you inconvenienced by most shops being closed on Sundays?"

We can only conclude that the Bill is designed for the benefit of certain chain stores which want to strangle small businesses, which is curious in the light of the Government's professed aim of helping small businesses.

The Bill is opposed by a significant number of large retailers, such as Boots the Chemists, Clarks shoe stores, the Co-operative Union, Dewhursts and Sears, Lewis's and Selfridge's. It is also opposed by the National Chamber of Trade, the National Federation of Meat Traders, the National Pharmaceutical Association, and the Multiple Shoe Retailers Association. On the spiritual side, it is opposed by the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Cardinal Archbishop of Westminster, the Moderator of the Free Federal Council and the churches of Scotland.

Mr. Paddy Ashdown (Yeovil): Would the right hon. Gentleman like to add to that list the names of no fewer than seven Ministers who, on 4 February 1983, voted against a Bill which was substantially the same—the hon. Member for Mid-Sussex (Mr. Renton), the right hon. Member for Tonbridge and Malling (Mr. Stanley), the right hon. Member for Suffolk, Coastal (Mr. Gummer), the hon. Member for Medway (Mrs. Fenner), the hon. Member for Peterborough (Dr. Mawhinney), the hon. Member for Rossendale and Darwen (Mr. Trippier) and the hon. Member for City of London and Westminster, South (Mr. Brooke)? Among those who voted against that Bill, and might therefore be expected to oppose this Bill, there were no fewer than three Whips — the hon. Members for Watford (Mr. Garel-Jones), for Hove (Mr. Sainsbury) and for Reading, West (Mr. Durant).

[Mr. Paddy Ashdown]

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. I should remind the House that 60 or 70 hon. Members are seeking to catch my eye and that interventions are made only at the expense of the speeches of other hon. Members. I shall have to take interventions into account when determining who catches my eye.

Mr. Stewart: The hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) has given some exceedingly useful information. I shall study the Division Lists.

The shop workers' unions oppose the Bill. The effect on women who are employed in retailing and children is obvious. I shall not go into that, as others will deal with it adequately. The interests of shop workers are a legitimate and important concern, which I happily endorse.

It is appalling that a party should be Whipped on an issue of conscience. No fewer than 91 per cent. of the public who were questioned in the Harris poll said that there should be a free vote. After this, the Government cannot put themselves forward as having any pretence to a belief in Christian morality. It is all the more reprehensible when one recalls the numerous private Members' Bills which were defeated. We will watch the reaction of the hon. Members whom the hon. Member for Yeovil mentioned.

The real issue is the spiritual one. The Bill goes directly against God's plan for living. The fourth commandment is an integral part of the moral law of God and is therefore binding on all men. By denying this, a nation erodes its moral and social fabric. The scripture warns us:

"Remove not the ancient landmark, which thy fathers have set."

The fourth commandment says:

"Remember the Sabbath day, to keep it holy."

The proposals in the Bill would be irreversible. If the Bill is carried, the House and the country will be crossing the Rubicon, and the nation will suffer for it.

5.26 pm

Sir Paul Bryan (Boothferry): The House recognises the strength of my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary's argument in favour of legislation. There must be legislation to get rid of the chaos of present Sunday trading laws. I would vote against the Bill if I was convinced that, as its opponents say, it is likely to change the special character of Sunday for the worse. That is why I have tabled the motion

"That it be an Instruction to any Committee to which the Shops Bill [Lords] may be committed that the Bill be amended to give statutory recognition to the special character of Sunday."

I would also vote against the Bill if I thought that it would affect family life for the worse.

From my family circumstances, I am almost tailor-made as a recruit for the Archbishop's crusade against the Bill. I am the son of a parson, my brother was a canon, my daughter is a deaconess, I am the father-in-law of a vicar and I go to church. I almost qualify for a passport to Heaven. However, it appears to me that the case of the Archbishop and his friends is too much based on a fantasy of Sunday — on what it used to be like once upon a time, and on what they would like it to be. There was a time, a long time ago, when a lot of people went to church.

One of my pre-first world war predecessors as chairman of the company over which I used to preside in the west riding of Yorkshire employed his people for 56 hours a week and, come Sunday, preached to them in the Methodist chapel, so they had enjoyed the benefit of his words seven days a week. A lot of people went to church then, but there was nothing else to do. The great Sunday revolution has come not from shopping but from the motor car, the coach, and the fact that many people now own their own homes. When we talk about the "special" character of Sunday, we should look at facts and decide what people actually do on Sunday. In my part of the world —Yorkshire—those who live in the less salubrious areas such as Huddersfield, Halifax and Bradford get in their motor cars and motor over, usually as families, to Scarborough, Bridlington, Filey, the moors, the zoo at Kirby Misperton, Castle Howard and the rest.

According to the Auld report, 10 per cent. of people in England go to church. I suspect that a higher percentage listen to and watch church services on the television and radio. Members of families do a lot of motoring, with fathers and mothers visiting their children and grandchildren and vice versa. That is all very healthy

There are 30,000 caravans between Scarborough and Filey, and correspondingly thousands of families use them. Some families have yachts. Many have weekend cottages and others use boarding houses and hotels in Scarborough. More and more people are playing and watching games. People go to the cinema, and play bingo.

During the past 30 years, house ownership has doubled, and gardening and do-it-yourself have become the great activities. Like many hon. Members, on Sundays people read the newspapers, go to sleep or watch television. Many families use the DIY stores on Sunday.

That is what I see in my constituency, although the position may differ in other constituencies. I do not think that the church has all that much to grumble about. One can say that people are attracted away from church by those pursuits, but there is competition between activities and we must cope with it. I do not think that the "new Sunday" is detrimental to family life. Many pastimes are undertaken as a family. Despite all that activity, Sunday is a quieter day than others. Towns are much quieter on Sundays. [HON. MEMBERS: "They will not be."] I shall answer those interventions in a minute. It is against this wider, growing background of leisure activity that I ask whether it is really true that the opening of a few shops on Sundays will completely change the social scene and the character of Sunday.

When considering the number of shops that will be affected by Sunday trading, we all speculate according to our prejudices. However, the Scottish example shows what actually happens, rather than what we imagine.

Mr. George Foulkes (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley): It is entirely different.

Sir Paul Bryan: Multiple shops with dealings on both sides of the border have given details showing that shopping habits are similar on the two sides of the border.

What are the facts in Scotland? According to the Auld report, 17 per cent. of people in Scotland go to church compared with 10 per cent. south of the border. Sunday trading does not, therefore, appear to cripple churchgoing.

Mr. Foulkes: They are less corruptible in Scotland.

Sir Paul Bryan: Apparently, prices in Scotland are not higher than they are south of the border.

The right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) said a great deal about the work force. As I understand it, those who work on Sundays in shops in Scotland are, on the whole, perfectly happy about doing so. There are few complaints. Many married women find that Sunday shopping is convenient because part-time, unskilled work for which they may be highly paid is available.

I know Scotland reasonably well. When I have motored through Scotland on a Sunday, the towns have been quieter than they are on other days of the week, just as happens in England. In America , where the number of church-goers is much higher than here, families go to church in the morning, go on to the supermarket for lunch and then go shopping in the afternoon. That seems a pleasant family outing. Everyone enjoys it. On the available evidence I believe that, in a year or two, we shall wonder what all the fuss was about.

The chambers of trade are understandably worried. One cannot say that Sunday trading will have no effect on all shops. It is bound to have some effect. One can, however, say that independent shops in Scotland do not seem to be worse off than they are in England.

The real revolution in shopping has been caused not by Sunday trading but by the motor car which has led to the development of large stores on the outskirts of towns. The housewife used to do her daily shopping locally to fill her shopping bag. She now does her weekly shopping to fill the boot of her car and to fill her freezer. That has inevitably hurt the small trader.

Local traders in my area recently sent me the findings of a poll showing that there is no demand for Sunday trading. That is not a good argument because, if there is no demand, there will be no effect on them. One should take notice of only those polls that measure what is happening or what has happened. If the polls forecast the future in hypothetical circumstances, they always get it wrong. The supreme example was broadcasting. When we had one BBC channel, the polls announced no demand for a second channel. Along came ITV, which soon had bigger audiences than the BBC. There was alleged to be no demand for BBC2 or a fourth channel. There was said to be no demand for expensive video recorders, but now they have swept the board.

Mrs. Ann Winterton (Congleton): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Sir Paul Bryan: I shall not give way. My hon. Friend will have opportunities to speak later.

In conclusion, I do not believe that Sunday trading will have a deleterious effect on the family or on the special character of Sunday. I support the Bill.

5.36 pm

Mr. Thomas Torney (Bradford, South): I declare an interest as a Member sponsored by the Union of Shop, Distributive and Allied Workers. For many years before I became a Member, I worked as a full-time officer with that union.

The Home Secretary was magnanimous in promising a free vote in Committee if the Bill is passed tonight, which I hope will not happen. A free vote would not be worth anything if the Government Whips insisted on including on the Committee Conservative Members who were yes-men on Government policy. May we have an assurance that the many Conservative Members who oppose the Bill will be fairly represented on the Committee? I hope that the answer is yes, even though I hope that the Bill is defeated.

I know from personal experience that shop workers have always been downtrodden, with poor pay and long unsocial hours. Even fringe benefits, such as holiday and sick pay and safety regulations, are comparatively new. The workers, usually members of the USDAW, have had to fight for them.

The Bill should be renamed the Exploitation of Workers in Shops (Open All Hours, Including Sundays) Bill. The Bill opens the way for exploitation and victimisation of shop workers. Those who imagine that protection will be given to shop workers who are religious and conscientiously object to working on Sundays are living in cloud-cuckoo-land. With 4 million unemployed knocking on the shop door, plus the threat of a halt to promotion prospects, the shopkeeper can easily suppress conscience and religion.

It is a fallacy for the Government to suggest that Sunday opening will create more employment. It will produce some part-time jobs, but only in shops, and only in shops that already have a considerable number of part-time workers. We want greater employment of full-time staff, but the Bill will further reduce the numbers of full-time workers to make way for part-timers. My right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) quoted a letter from Hillards, which has supermarkets in my constituency. I have received a similar letter, and I endorse what he said.

Mr. Baldry: Does the Labour party believe that the present law is satisfactory? If it is not, how does the hon. Gentleman, and the Labour party, suggest that it could be reformed? Can he make that clear to the House?

Mr. Torney: My trade union, and certainly the Labour party, recognises the illogicalities of the present legislation relating to shop hours. However, the Labour Government never introduced a Bill of complete deregulation. Therefore, I pass the responsibility back to the Government, where it rightly belongs. They have introduced a Bill of complete deregulation. If they wish to move away from it, they must produce legislation to replace it. Surely it is not beyond the power of the experts in the Public Bill Office to assist the Government with that. The Government should withdraw the Bill and come back with something different.

The often-quoted Auld report states that protection is required for shop workers, but with the Wages Bill the Government will abolish the protection provided by previous legislation. We hear much about the consumer and freedom of choice, but, if we look carefully, we find that there is plenty of choice and opportunity to shop. Many supermarkets and hypermarkets open as late as 8 pm on many evenings, and some stay open until 9 pm.

The only reason for Sunday opening is for people who forget something. The shop workers' unions have agreements with many employers about late-night opening, and large firms will confirm that the unions have never been obstructionist on this issue. We merely want to protect our members and to ensure that proper premium payments are made if they must work late or overtime.

[Mr. Torney]

If the Bill is passed, it will contribute to making Sunday just another day, not only for shop workers but for all workers. There will be no premium or overtime payments for those who are called upon to work on Sundays. That should be a warning to all workers in industry. Once premium payments are abolished for shop workers—the wages councils have already disappeared — other workers will have to follow suit.

Traditionally, Sunday is a peaceful day when families and friends, including thousands of shop workers, can get together and, even though it may require using a motor car, we want to keep it that way. The Government talk about the freedom to open or close, but they show complete naivety about modern distribution. It is clear that they have failed to think the issue through properly.

There will be absolutely no choice for retailers, because they cannot afford to lose business to competitors who stay open. Competition in the high street is immense, and the margins on food are small. I assure the Government that if one shop on the high street opens, they will all open. I know that from personal experience. When I was a young man working in a shop, my boss would send me out to see whether the other shops were closing before he would agree to close. Most of the large retailing chains are opposed to Sunday opening, but many have categorically said that, while they oppose the Bill, if it is passed they will have to open.

That brings me to a point about Scotland. The major chains in the south also have shops in Scotland. They have said that if the Bill is passed they will also open on Sunday in Scotland. I assure the House that the present laissez-faire position in Scotland will go to the wall if the Bill is passed.

The point about large retail firms has already been made by my right hon. Friend the Member for Gorton, so I shall not repeat the point about Hillards. Only so much money is available among the consuming public. Eventually all shops will open on Sundays if the Bill is passed, so that money will be spread over seven days instead of six. Therefore, there will be no extra trade. There will be extra trade only if a shop opens and others do not. That shop would then steal a march on the others. But, as the major retailers know that, they will all open and there will be no extra trade. Is that the price of the freedom of the few?

Our traditional, peaceful Sunday will go, and obviously prices will be higher to cover the greater overheads of seven-day trading. Shops and their staff will be exploited, and eventually all workers will lose premium payments for Sunday. USDAW, the majority of shop workers and I say that if we cannot defeat the Bill tonight, we must defeat it in Committee.

5.47 pm

Mr. Mark Carlisle (Warrington, South): Unlike my right hon. Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire, South-East (Mr. Pym), I certainly support the Government and hope that the Bill will be carried, supported by my right hon. and hon. Friends.

The main reason why I support the Government is that the present law is nonsense. It is illogical, full of anomalies, easily open to ridicule and out of touch with the reality of life today. It is widely disregarded, and those who must enforce it do not wish to do so. To the extent that it is enforced, it is patchy and unfair to individual traders. To continue in that way brings the law into disrepute, and that cannot be right. In those circumstances, the Government are right to take responsibility and to act as they have done. I hope that those who accept the need for change will support the Government on Second Reading.

Some of those who accept the argument for change tell us that, despite that, total deregulation and freedom do not provide the answer. However, I question whether there is a workable compromise. Having considered the various compromises, I am not convinced that that is so. All the options suggested are, to my mind, open to objection and would raise continued problems of enforcement.

I shall give two examples. To attempt to extend and update a list of goods allowed to be sold on Sundays would lead rapidly to yet more anomalies and become out of date and out of touch with the needs of society. As many of my right hon. and hon. Friends have argued, the local option is not an alternative. That would merely be to pass the buck to others to decide in our place.

Sir Raymond Gower rose——

Mr. Carlise: I would rather not give way to my hon. Friend, as I know that many right hon. and hon. Members wish to contribute to the debate.

The only sensible alternative to the present law is to give freedom to shops to open and to the public to shop if and when they wish to do so. I realise, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire, South-East has said, that there are many who are opposed to the Bill. The fact that I do not agree with their arguments does not mean, as some seem to imply, that I and others who share my view are not prepared to listen to what they have to say. I respect the sincerity of those who oppose the Bill and those behind the Keep Sunday Special campaign, but they should not try to hijack Sunday for themselves.

It is reasonable and possible to like the traditional Sunday, to be a Christian and yet believe that someone, if he wishes, should be free to buy a mowing machine on a Sunday just as he is free at present to buy petrol to put inside one. It is reasonable to support the present traditional Sunday and believe in it, yet not believe that it is necessary to use the criminal law to prevent people who wish to shop from doing so. As my hon. Friend the Member for Boothferry (Sir P. Bryan) said, we allow many forms of commercial activity to take place on a Sunday. Public houses, restaurants and amusement arcades are open and professional sport takes place on a Sunday. I do not see on what moral basis we can suggest that it is wrong for shops to open when so many other places are open.

It is said that Sunday is a family day and a day on which to relax. That is how many of us like to spend our Sundays. I would point out to hon. Members, however, that the members of many families find that the only day on which they can go out together is Sunday. If they choose to shop rather than indulge in any other form of outing, I fail to see what is wrong in that.

Unlike the Bill's opponents, I do not believe that the effect of this measure will be to change the traditional Sunday. I believe that there is a demand for the Bill. The number of those who shop on a Sunday shows that to be so. I believe that certain types of shop will open widely once the Bill is enacted. It is my view that the fears which have been expressed by some of those who have already contributed to the debate are exaggerated. After the early days, things will settle down and some types of shop will be open and others will not. In areas where there is demand, some shops will open; where that demand does not exist, they will not.

We are not forcing anyone to open his shop on a Sunday and we are not forcing anyone to shop on a Sunday. The only objection to the Bill could be if we were seeking to force people who have strong and genuine objection to work on a Sunday. Despite what the hon. Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Torney) said, I do not believe that that will happen. I remind the hon. Gentleman and the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) that 4·5 million people already work on a Sunday—many of them not in essential services—and we do not complain about that.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East): They do not all work every Sunday.

Mr. Carlisle: I do not see why shop workers should necessarily work every Sunday. Shops open on a Sunday in Scotland and I understand that there is no shortage of people who wish to work in them. I am sure that will be the response in England and Wales.

I believe that the concerns and objections are greatly exaggerated, as is the effect that the Bill will have on the traditional Sunday. As my hon. Friend the Member for Boothferry said, the Bill's opponents ignore the reality of Sunday.

If we allow shops to open on a Sunday, it will be in response to those who wish to see a change of that nature. As I have said, the present law is nonsense. It is wrong to use the criminal law in this area. For those reasons, I support the Bill.

5.55 pm

Mr. Paddy Ashdown (Yeovil): I can readily and happily agree with the right hon. and learned Member for Warrington, South (Mr. Carlisle) that the present law is more honoured in the breach than in the observance, and is in many senses disreputable. I understand that there are those in the House and outside who hold views that are entirely principalistic in their nature, which the right hon. and learned Gentleman might regard as the Sabbatian view of Sunday. I do not believe that that view is held widely in the House, but it is one which deserves respect, and that respect should be accorded to it.

There is no doubt in my mind—I believe that this is the prevailing view in the House — that the current legislation needs reform and amendment. It creates confusion and situations that are difficult for shopkeepers. The present law frequently leads to difficulties for those whose job it is to uphold the law. I am not opposed to reform in general, but that is not to say that I am in favour of any sort of reform, whatever its nature and implications.

When I came to examine the Bill, I applied four criteria by which I would judge my attitude to it. First, I took the view that we should not go for entirely free licence; that we should not deregulate to such an extent that we destroy the essential nature and character of our Sunday. Secondly, I considered that there should be a requirement adequately and effectively to protect the rights of shop workers. Thirdly, I decided that the Bill should give local communities some determination of how the law might be applied in their areas to meet the different natures of our various communities throughout Britain. Fourthly, I took the view that the Government should take into account —perhaps not in the Bill but in parallel legislation—the effect that the Bill would have on small retailers if it were enacted in its present form.

The Bill fails to satisfy, not on one, but on all four of those counts. First, total deregulation is proposed—total free licence. The Bill sweeps away all regulations. If enacted, it would allow Sunday to become the same as any other day of the week. There are those who will be deeply offended by that prospect of religious principle, and I can understand that.

For me there are even more important factors to be taken into account. There is a need for a rest day, when families can get together. This need is stated clearly in the Bible, particularly in the gospel according to St. Mark, which states:

"The sabbath is made for man, and not man for the sabbath."

It is essential that there should be that rhythm in our lives. It is a requirement that we have a day of rest. That view was expressed elegantly and powerfully by Lord Stockton in another place, when he said:

"Let us remember that the great commandment that was handed down to God's chosen people was perhaps the greatest social reform in the history of civilisation; the concept that every man or woman, however humble, should have at least some period of rest."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 21 January 1986; Vol. 470, c. 160.]

On that ground alone, the Bill could result in a fundamental and irreversible change to our Sunday. That will be important in its effect on the family, an issue which has been raised by right hon. and hon. Members already. It has been calculated that 1 million women will be drawn into employment on a part-time basis on Sundays if the Bill comes into effect. There has been a strong push towards part-time work, and the number employed in the retail sector has almost doubled over the past three years.

I find it ironic, therefore, that, as the right hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, South-East (Mr. Pym) said, the Conservative party manifesto in 1983 made no mention of the legislation. But the manifesto went further than that. The manifesto which elected the Government said that the Tories were pledged to defend—I shall use their words precisely—Britain's "distinctive way of life" and "build a responsible society which protects the weak but also allows the family . . . to flourish."

The Bill will create conditions which will damage the one day of the week when, as the hon. Member for Boothferry (Sir P. Bryan) said, the family can get together to enjoy those wonderful outings which he described as a family occupation. They will be disrupted because the mother or father, probably the mother, will be away working in a shop because she will be required to do so. The free licence will damage the family unit which the Conservative party at the general election pledged itself to protect.

The Bill will do more than that. As currently drafted, it could cause significant damage to communities because it will introduce into communities a free licence for more traffic and more commercial operation on the one day when they can expect some peace. It will disturb the peace of many of our communities. Therefore, the Bill fails at that hurdle.

Many right hon. and hon. Gentlemen have touched on the question of the protection of the rights of shop workers. It is true that partially, at least, the Bill protects the rights of such shop workers as are employed when the Bill comes into force. However, it does not provide for a similar right in the future. I fail to understand the logic of that. If a right is worth protecting now, surely it is worth protecting in the future. Why should we make an arbitrary decision about what rights an individual shall have according to whether they are currently employed in a shop or employed in the future? If now, why not in the future also?

But even the protection currently provided is wholly inadequate. The Bill has certain safeguards in respect of disciplining a shop worker who refuses to work on a Sunday. It prohibits that and it prohibits the sacking of a shop worker for refusing Sunday work. It does nothing, however, to safeguard a shop worker's ordinary expectations for promotion and advancement if he refuses to work on a Sunday. There are examples of that happening already. There was a recent example in Sheffield where a store manager was required to leave his £13,000 job because he refused to work on a Sunday.

Those of us who complain about that issue have to face the fact that it would be impossible to protect completely the rights of shop workers by any form of legislation. However, we can provide some form of protection, even for those who would wish to join the profession in the future. A clause which makes it illegal to discriminate against someone who is not prepared to work on a Sunday could have an application similar to that which makes it illegal to discriminate on racial or sexual grounds. That is not perfect protection, but it can act as a bulwark against such discrimination and act as a mechanism for testing in the courts of Britain whether such discrimination has taken place. But no such provision exists in the Bill.

Perhaps we should not be surprised at that, because when it comes to the protection of shopworkers we know that the Government take a purely minimalistic view. The Auld committee recognised that. The Government prayed in aid the Auld committee to support their position on the Bill. The committee clearly said that it felt that if Sunday trading was deregulated appropriate protection should be put in its place. But, as the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) said, the Government have moved in precisely the opposite direction, by dismantling the protection of wages council and by massively reducing the amount of resources available to the inspectorate for employment and shops provisions and conditions.

The Bill not only provides no protection, but will be used as an instrument for further exploitation of the very vulnerable and mainly young work force within the retail sector. On those grounds alone, even if the other criteria that I mentioned were satisfied, I would oppose the Bill.

My final criterion was that of local option. Conservative Members have rightly asked how we can reform the Bill. I see nothing wrong with allowing an element, perhaps even a significant element, of local option. Indeed, it is interesting to note that the Auld committee was interested in that suggestion and said that it had some attraction. The problem for the committee was the inconsistency. Of course there are inconsistencies and differences in the various communities of Britain. There are differences between Bermondsey and rural mid Wales. Why should they have the same application of the law?

We already give considerable freedom to our local government institutions and local authorities to determine car parking and housing policy, which are dealt with differently in different areas. The same applies to taxi charges, education, collection of rubbish and even widows war pension relief. These touch on people's lives just as closely as shop opening. If we allow such inconsistencies now, why should we not allow them in this case? Why not frame within legislation the capacity to determine the hours the shop may open in one location or another within the ambit of the planning procedures? That would provide for a much clearer acceptance of the differences of the local conditions. Such inconsistencies which did arise would not be long lived where they were ridiculous, and where they were not ridiculous they would be consistent with genuine local differences of belief, practice, and environmental conditions.

Mr. David Alton (Liverpool, Mossley Hill): Does my hon. Friend agree that if the local electorate were tested on the issue, it would succeed in a way in which the Bill fundamentally fails? A measure is being brought forward which has not been tested in an election, which is offensive to millions of people in this country and on which millions of people have never had a chance to vote.

Mr. Ashdown: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. That is precisely the point. It would not only provide an opportunity to vote on this issue, which we have not had as it was not in the Conservative manifesto, but would allow the differences between our various local communities to be expressed.

The Bill will unquestionably damage the network of small retail outlets in Britain. That case has been more elegantly made elsewhere. The Government pray in aid, for example, the experience of Sweden, where they say that 3,000 new shops have been opened. I ask Conservative Members to recognise that in Sweden a small retail outlet is one with fewer than 25 branches. That is hardly what we would consider to be in danger in this country. We also ought to recognise the fact that in Sweden the Government have a full package to assist small retail outlets. We know that no such package is under consideration by the Government.

At the beginning of my speech I mentioned the issue of principle. There are principles and practicalities involved. For many, the principle will predominate. My party believes that this is, in part, for all of us an issue of conscience. We will therefore have a free vote. We do not understand why the Government will not allow a free vote. I must say in passing that I do not understand why the Labour party, which has made a considerable point on this issue, is not prepared to allow a free vote as well. However, returning to the Government, seven members of the Government Bench voted against the earlier Bill, and they will have to go into the Lobby tonight voting in favour of this Bill. Three Whips voted against the other Bill when it appeared before us. They will have to go through the process of Whipping their own colleagues in to vote for this measure. Only two years ago the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department, the hon. Member for Putney (Mr. Mellor), who is not in his place now, but was earlier, said:

> "There are important considerations and fears about the character of Sunday, . . . These fears are held in many parts of the House and I agree that they are an important factor. That is why the Government adhere to the view, which successive Governments have adhered to, that the decision must be for the individual conscience of hon. Members."—[Official Report, 4 February 1983; Vol. 36, c. 557.]

We are entitled to know why the Government have changed their mind on this issue. Why do they now use the disgraceful instrument of the party Whip to coerce Conservative Members to vote on what two years ago a Minister recognised as an issue of individual conscience? We are glad that there has been an admission that there will be no guillotine on the Bill.

I am in favour of reform, but not any reform. I cannot support the Bill as it currently stands. The Bill in its present form will damage the essential character of our life in Britain. It will hurt the family, which the Government make such a virtue of seeking to protect. It will endanger the essential character of many of our local communities. It provides an instrument for the exploitation of shopworkers, whom the Government have already made one of the most vulnerable groups in Britain. It gives no power of determination to local communities. It will be a further blow to the fast-diminishing number of small retail outlets in our communities. It is being run through Parliament, against the Government's own commitments, by coercion by the party Whip and against the conscience of the Government's own members. I and many of my colleagues will oppose the Bill for those reasons.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. Earlier this afternoon I gave an undertaking to the Leader of the Opposition that I would reconsider my decision not to select the reasoned amendment that is on the Order Paper in his name and the names of his right hon. and hon. Friends. I have done so, and I now say to the Opposition Front Bench that it will be in order for the hon. Member for Battersea (Mr. Dubs) to move that amendment when he rises to wind up the debate.

Mr. Meadowcroft: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I heard the discussion with you earlier. I suspect that hon. Members are now placed in some difficulty. They thought that the debate was taking place on the basis of the instructions that were given from the Chair at the very beginning of the debate. Hon. Members are now in difficulty because they find that that former decision has been reversed. If, after pressure from one side of the House, your decision can be reconsidered and changed, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think that that is the moment when I stop the hon. Gentleman. I gave an undertaking that I would reconsider the matter. What I have announced does not in any sense narrow the debate, which was my concern.

Mr. Neil Macfarlane (Sutton and Cheam): I am grateful for the opportunity to take part in the debate, Mr. Speaker. I assure you that I shall be brief, although, having heard the comments of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, I doubt very much whether there will be much brevity about the passage of the Bill in the remaining months of this Session. There is now an element of confusion, although I am anxious to do all that I can to help my colleagues on the Front Bench.

My prime concern stems from what we might speculate will be the effect of the Bill. My concern is not so much about the present situation. The traditional Sunday has changed over the past 25 years. Nowadays even the younger generation would have some doubts about what precisely a traditional Sunday is. I am often told that we represent the party that espouses Victorian values. I have never understood that fully. If that were logically applied and we had Victorian values, everywhere would be closed on Sundays, and we would have rather a joyless day.

As I said, my concern stems from speculation about the effects of the Bill. I appreciate that there are many anomalies in the current framework of our legislation on retailing. I can well understand that the legalistic mind of the lawyer is anxious to have the Bill tidied up, but I have some sympathy for my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary because he has picked up the policy from his predecessor.

I do not want to tell my constituents in Sutton and Cheam when they should shop or which retailers should open and when they should open. As the hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) and many Conservative Members have said, I do not believe that the Bill will improve the quality of life, particularly in the suburbs of towns and cities—I represent a suburban area—and that is my concern.

As my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Warrington, South (Mr. Carlisle) said, there are now professional sporting events on a Sunday, and the motor car has opened up new possibilities. The framework of a Sunday is totally different from what it was. The fact is that what we are proposing will unquestionably change our Sunday. Those are the things of which we must be most aware when considering the matter over the next few months. We must understand what we are triggering off.

I have never accepted the argument that the Bill will be a job creator, because I believe that all it will do is transfer the pattern through a seven-day week. We know that many retailers do not open on a Monday. They will simply transfer more to Sundays. The hon. Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Torney), who speaks for the Union of Shop, Distributive and Allied Workers, made it clear that he expected an increase in the pool of part-time employment. I echo those sentiments. That is not good. I do not like it at all.

The proposals of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will have a major impact on the people in the suburbs of our towns and cities over the next few years. As you will know, Mr. Speaker, representing a seat in an area not dissimilar from mine, over the past 10 or 15 years there has been a stark change in Good Friday. Good Friday, which is perhaps the greatest symbol of Christian hope, has now become a day like any other. I should have thought that it was logical that Sunday would become the same. I cannot believe that there can be any serious disregard for that argument. I think that Sunday will become like any other day. That may well be what a large proportion of the nation wants. It is what a large proportion of the nation already has now. We must work out precisely what we want to do and exactly what will be the bottom line in a few years' time. My hon. Friend the Member for Boothferry (Sir P. Bryan) said that in 15 years' time everyone will wonder what all the fuss was about. I am not certain that I share that opinion. We shall have to wait and see. I suspect that the Bill has some way to go before it reaches the statute book.

I ask hon. Members on both sides of the House to consider the problems, such as the competition that many of the retailers will face. Many of them have already said that they will open, and others have said that they will not. I should have thought that the very fact that many of them are committed to opening, such as W. H. Smith, Mothercare, DIY companies and other retailers that we know about, means that it is inevitable that some of those who have said that they will not open ultimately will. Who could blame them? They will have to open. I would not blame them for doing so. Many of them would be mad if they did not. In fine cities, such as Edinburgh and London, and in the north-east and the west midlands, where there is an element of strong tourist appeal throughout the year, it would not be in their interests to remain closed. The big retailers in Oxford street and Bond street, and in the centre of London, would also be mad not to open.

Therefore, what we are proposing undoubtedly will have an effect. It will have an effect on young people who are starting out on a career in retailing. Their annual staff appraisal might include the words, "Quite a good company man" — or woman — "but won't work Sundays. Therefore, does not have the company's interests at heart." I think that that will begin to emerge.

Mr. Michael Shersby (Uxbridge): Does my hon. Friend agree that many small retailers will have to open, which will lead to a severe diminution in family life for them?

Mr. Macfarlane: That is right. As we have heard before, the part-time jobs that could be created as a result of the Bill will be largely for students and women, and women are the anchor of the family.

There will be an increase in noise and perhaps because vehicles will now be making deliveries on Sundays. In my constituency and in many others on the outer peripheries of big cities—the villages and more rural areas will not be affected so much—undoubtedly a transport manager will say to his staff and his board of directors, "I think I can save you several pounds per week per vehicle if you start to deliver on a Sunday," and jobs might disappear as a result of that. In my constituency, we have many major through routes. We already have much commuting traffic on a Sunday, and I think that there will be a major increase in that.

I do not know whether my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, or indeed any of his colleagues on the Front Bench, wishes to see a dramatic change in our traditional Sunday, or the Sunday that they consider to be traditional. I suspect that their offspring might have different ideas about the traditional Sunday. I do not believe that they want to see that change. That is why we are beginning to see a slight shift in the policy and opinions of the Front Bench, for which I have sympathy.

The Bill will change our way of life. It is not in the best interests of the country. Therefore, although I shall not vote against my colleagues, because my heart is still with them, I shall abstain and closely watch the Bill's passage in Committee, on Report and on Third Reading.

Mr. Terry Lewis (Worsley): That this is one of the most controversial measures to be brought before this Parliament cannot be doubted, especially when one witnesses the extent of the disarray on the Conservative Benches and notes the Government's recent reaction to the threatened rebellion of Back-Bench Members. There is no doubt that the hostile public response to the Bill has transferred from nervous Back-Bench Members to the Government, even at this late stage, hence the apparent Whipping concessions. I hope that the Home Secretary's undertaking not to impose a guillotine if the Bill passes its Second Reading tonight will mean at least fundamental changes to the Bill. I hope, however, that the Bill will not overcome its first hurdle tonight.

The battle lines are clearly drawn and opponents from all sections of society have come out firmly in vocal opposition to the Bill. Not least significant in the opposition to deregulation of shop hours are the churches. For once in my life, I completely agree with the various religious organisations. I am sure that the churches do not oppose the Bill to coerce the public into attending church on Sundays. Instead, they argue correctly that for hundreds of years Sunday has been a special day. That point has been made by many hon. Members. It is a day whose promise of rest, relaxation and family togetherness provides, in a contemporary sense, a break of sorts in our increasingly hectic and pressurised lifestyles.

A strange feature of today's debate is that most hon. Members would rarely benefit from the advantages for which they argue on other people's behalf. That is certainly my position.

The Lord Bishop of Winchester in another place provided the strongest argument against the Bill when he said:

> "Total deregulation is a too-drastic solution because it could well lead to the erosion of something we greatly value—a corporate rest day which gives identity to our community. We need these opportunities of rest and recreation for families, and recreation includes . . . worship . . . We do not want the cohesive character of . . . society to be sacrificed for the sake of greater commercial gain on Sundays."—[Official Report, House of Lords; 2 December 1985; Vol. 468, c. 1103.]

I say "Amen" to that.

To counter such arguments, supporters of the Shops Bill say that the special character of Sunday is rapidly disappearing from our society. In their view, abolishing Sunday trading restrictions would be an appropriate response to these modern times. There is no doubt, however, that a significant majority of the population favours the maintenance of a special Sunday that does not become just another day. My post bag reinforces my view that the special character of Sunday should be preserved as far as practicable as a day of leisure in which a person is not required to pursue his or her weekday work and is free to do what he or she chooses.

The question then becomes whether the liberalisation of the trading laws will alter the special character of Sunday. Paragraph 132 of the Auld report, on which the Government justify the Shops Bill, states:

> "Widespread opening of shops on Sundays would affect the traditional character of the day very much more profoundly than the opening of cinemas, concert halls and theatres"— that point was made earlier by my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman)—

> "or the holding of sporting events. The change would be likely to affect far more people in the way that they spend their Sundays, and would have a significant effect on the feel of the day."

That is just one of the many cases in which the Auld committee's conclusions are hardly supported by its arguments. It is clear that Sunday trading would hasten rather than respond to the demise of our traditional special Sunday.

I return to the economic effects of unrestricted Sunday trading. The Auld committee, again to determine the likely effects of the Shops Bill, commissioned a report from the Institute for Fiscal Studies. Although the committee chose to regard that report as the final word on the subject, the IFS begins its report with an explicit disclaimer:

"The principal conclusion reached is that it cannot be decided on a priori grounds whether the restrictions on consumer choice, inherent in limitations to trading hours . . . could nevertheless yield overall benefits. The fact that shops choose to open on Sundays does not guarantee that the gains derived from greater consumer choice will offset the additional costs involved. A final assessment must depend on an empirical study of the costs and benefits involved, and this has not been addressed previously."

I reject that suck-it-and-see approach, but to rely on empirical evidence sells the pass with regard to maintaining our traditional Sunday.

Staying with the IFS report for a moment, and referring specifically to the suggestion that a 13 per cent. increase in opening hours would lead to a 10 per cent. increase in costs, I must register my profound unease at some implications of that. There is no doubt that there would be an insufficient increase in retail trade to make up for the increased costs. As a result, the costs per unit of sales would necessarily increase to the detriment of consumers. In the long run, as has been said, smaller stores that operate on the margin will be squeezed out of business. The consequence will be that the highly regarded convenience of the local store will disappear and once again, and this must be repeated, the less mobile, the sick, the elderly and families without personal transport—not everyone has a motor car—will suffer inconvenience. Indeed, there is little doubt that their cost of living will increase commensurately as retail domination forces prices up, as I forecast it will if the Bill is passed.

I would have wished to say more on this important matter, but in the interests of brevity and because I want to hear the speeches of many more Conservative rebels, I shall conclude my remarks. I pray in aid the IFS report on which the Auld committee placed such store. The IFS concluded that as many as 20,000 workers would lose their jobs as a result of open-all-hours trading. With unemployment at such an intolerable level, that would serve only to exacerbate an already unacceptable position. That alone is too high a price to pay for the dubious benefits claimed for the Bill. However, just as worrying is the nature of the job losses. The jobs that will be lost will tend to be full-time jobs that require some skill and training. Full-time jobs also tend to lead to the development of jobs in which employees rise within a company, acquiring more skill and loyalty to the firm. To replace those jobs with unskilled, part-time employees is undesirable. That is why I shall oppose the Bill. I hope that many Conservative Members will do the same.

Sir Peter Blaker (Blackpool, South): I refer to the letter that has been sent to all right hon. and hon. Members by the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Cardinal Archbishop of Westminster and the Moderator of the Free Church Federal Council. They make several points which I wish to discuss. The letter refers to a large petition against the Bill. My constituency experience is that considerably more people support the Bill than oppose it. We know from opinion polls that were taken in 1984 and 1985 that a vast majority of people favour seven-day shopping in England and Wales. I understand that, for union members, the percentage is even higher than for non-union members. Therefore, it is clear that the majority of people want us to give a Second Reading to the Bill.

The second point of the Archbishop and his colleagues is that they do not wish to throw away the special character of Sunday. I have been enormously impressed throughout the debate by the confidence with which so many hon. Members have forecast exactly what horrors will result from the Bill. Many of the Bill's opponents have remarkable powers of foresight. That was especially true of the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman).

I am much less confident about what will happen in the future, but I believe that the special character of Sunday will not be destroyed. I cannot prove it beyond doubt, but I believe that there is relevant evidence.

As Aneurin Bevan said,

"Why look in the crystal ball when you can read the book?"

For me, the book is Scotland. I am half Scottish, although that does not give me a particular claim to interpret the Scots. Nevertheless, I believe that Scotland is more like England than it was some years ago because of the pressures to which my hon. Friend the Member for Boothferry (Sir P. Bryan) referred in his impressive speech in support of the Bill. Mobility, television and all the other modern pressures have made the different parts of this country far more similar than they were 50 years ago. The large number of Scots who come to Blackpool seem very similar to the people who come from Yorkshire, the south of England and elsewhere, except that they tend to enjoy themselves rather more vociferously. I believe, therefore, that Scotland provides the best evidence available. I should apologise to those who oppose the Bill for actually referring to facts, but it seems perfectly clear to me that the special character of Sunday is alive and well in Scotland. Some of my Scottish hon. Friends may wish to comment further on that.

It has been suggested that the Scottish experience is not relevant to England and Wales, but if the effects of liberalisation turn out to be different in England and Wales from those which have occurred in Scotland, it will be because the people of England and Wales want them to be different. It is not right to use the criminal law to try to prevent the people of England and Wales from following the course, the culture and the life that they wish, especially as the present law is already in such disrepute. That would be a most unwise course to follow. If Scotland is still a more sabbatarian society, it is surely remarkable that Scotland can accept deregulation with enthusiasm while in a less sabbatarian society, if such it be, people are arguing against deregulation. It seems to me that that argument works in the opposite direction from the way in which it has so far been used.

With regard to the anxieties of the Archbishop and his friends, I remind the House that 16 per cent. of people in Scotland still go to church while the figure for England and Wales is only 10 per cent.

The Archbishop and his friends were also concerned about what they described as the "commercial imperative", suggesting that "we can expect a steadily rising trend over the next 5 to 10 years which ultimately will make Sunday barely distinguishable from Saturdays."

Again, they ignore the experience in Scotland and the fact that fewer than 20 per cent. of shops in Scotland are open on Sundays. I think that the House will agree that if anyone recognises a commercial imperative when he sees one, it is a Scot. Therefore, I am not greatly impressed by that argument. The Archbishop and his friends, like many Opposition Members, seem to think that shopkeepers enjoy making a loss. In my experience, if shopkeepers think that they will make a loss they do not open, which doubtless accounts for the fact that fewer than 20 per cent. of shops in Scotland are open on Sundays. I am therefore not impressed by that argument either.

[Sir Peter Blaker]

The Archbishop and his friends also fear that shop workers will suffer, but an opinion poll has shown that 72 per cent. of the people in Scotland who work on Sundays wish to be allowed to continue. Again, why look in the crystal when we can read the book? Scotland is the open book.

The Archbishop and his friends hope that the House will not support the Bill

"unless it is substantially amended to protect the traditional character of Sunday."

We cannot amend the Bill unless it receives a Second Reading. We should therefore give the Bill a Second Reading and then consider the exact form in which it should emerge on to the statute book.

Deregulation is popular in Scotland. An opinion poll in 1985 showed that 98 per cent. of respondents in Scotland thought that the quality of life had not been affected. Sunday it still different from other days of the week in Scotland. It is still a day of leisure and a day for the family. People shop as families, especially for joint decision purchases such as lawnmowers, to which reference has already been made. People do not find themselves compelled to work against their will. There is no shortage of volunteers to work on Sundays. According to the evidence that I have seen, small shops in Scotland have not suffered. Prices have not risen as a result of Sunday opening. I understand that when a questionnaire was sent to various churches in Scotland asking whether they felt that there should be more regulation, the only reply received was from the Free Presbyterian Church which has only 16,000 members. The evidence that I have, therefore, is that the Scots are content with their situation and cannot understand what all the fuss is about in England and Wales.

Mr. Sheerman: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Sir Peter Blaker: In fairness to others, I would rather not give way.

With deregulation, Sunday is still special in Scotland and I am not convinced that the situation would be any different in England. Sunday in England has certainly changed in the past decade. Until very recently the cathedral shop in Canterbury was open on Sundays and selling the "Good Pub Guide" to Kent. I do not complain about that. It is a sign of the way in which attitudes have changed.

Sunday is special in England in another important respect—the extent to which the law is defied. I believe that when the law is so widely defied the time has come to consider changing it.

There are two options before us. The first is to reject the Bill, in which case the existing law will have to be enforced far more rigorously, which I believe will be deeply unpopular with the vast majority of people. Interestingly, the spokesman for the Opposition, the right hon. Member for Gorton, refused to answer questions about the Labour party's attitude to this because he knew that to insist on enforcement of the law as it stands would be deeply unpopular. I therefore look forward to hearing from the Labour party——

Mr. Sheerman rose——

Sir Peter Blaker: I do not want to hear from the Labour party now, but I look forward to hearing in the Opposition winding-up speech about the attitude of the Labour party to enforcement.

The alternative, which I must prefer, is to give the Bill a Second Reading and thus allow the House, while keeping Sunday special, to bring the law into line with what people want and with common sense.

6.38 pm

Mr. A. E. P. Duffy (Sheffield, Attercliffe): When the House last discussed Sunday trading, it was addressing one of those intriguing areas of public policy in which there are sound arguments on both sides, but that was last May and the position is no longer the same. The balance of the argument has shifted against Sunday trading, thanks to opposition in the other place and the Keep Sunday Special campaign, whereas the supporters of the Bill have had nothing new to say, save the surprising claim of the Home Secretary today that he has now received more signatures in support of the Bill.

The Home Secretary starts from the basis that if the law is being openly broken it must be changed. But how openly is it being broken and where are the black spots? In any event, does not a duty of enforcement lie with district councils? When and how far have district councils been encouraged by the Home Office to do their duty? The Government's only response has been to call for a change in the law. The Government plead that there are anomalies, but, given the extent to which retailing has changed since the war, it is scarcely surprising that anomalies have arisen. Must we really go the whole hog to the deregulation of shop hours to resolve them? What defeatism! Do we need Sunday trading because district councils receive no guidance from the Government?

That is certainly not the case in Sheffield, where the city council last month reaffirmed its opposition to the Bill. This opposition is supported by the Sheffield Council of Churches, the chamber of trade, Family Concern, the two trade unions principally involved—the GMBATU and USDAW—and by all but one of the representations that I have received.

The only exception within my constituency has come from the local Asda, which wants the Bill. But Asda makes no mention of the Bill's impact on its workers or on local residential amenities. It does not appear to have occurred to Asda to ascertain how far local residents want heavy lorries, noisy deliveries or impossible parking to split asunder their quiet traditional Sunday.

How many Members of Parliament who tonight plan to vote for Sunday trading live near a supermarket or have checked with those of their constituents who do? I wonder whether there is even one such Conservative Member. Are the Government therefore insisting that for a city such as Sheffield—or south Yorkshire as a whole—there is no case for a local option, and that the local authority be allowed to establish, either through its elected councillors or by a local referendum, whether there should be Sunday opening and, if so, the permitted hours? Environmental judgments of this order are taken daily by planning authorities. To extend a power over Sunday trading in this way would enhance local democracy and thus provide for choice.

Those who say that shops need not open must be unaware of what is now happening to retailing both at home and overseas. It is clear from the Home Secretary's speech that he does not know what is happening in Sweden, and he is even less aware of what is happening in the United States, given what he said about small shops being unaffected by seven-day trading. No other Bill has been presented to the House with less sureness of touch and confidence. The Home Secretary's performance was inept and unimpressive.

Fierce, uncompromising competition has changed the face of retailing. The number of retail outlets has halved in the last 25 years, and 60,000 small shops have gone in the past 10 years. I speak not as a theorist, because my family is involved in the retail sector and in a small shop. I know what I am talking about. Those who survive are under great pressure. With the proportion of national income devoted to spending in the shops down from 46 to 36 per cent. since the war, the overriding incentive is to retain market share. Among the national department stores and supermarkets, some have notoriously and quite unscrupulously sought to bounce Parliament into unrestricted opening hours, and some Conservative Members are falling for it.

The Home Secretary says that there is no workable compromise, but I have offered one. He claims that there is a large public demand for Sunday opening, but the March survey by Harris finds differently. He declared that implementation of the Bill will not stop Sunday remaining special. But if large parts of the community go out each Sunday morning to serve in shops, if the streets are never to know the stillness of non-working days, and if husbands are chivvied by wives to drive or accompany them to a supermarket, things will be very different.

The Home Secretary does not believe that there will be any great increase in public spending on public services. That is not the finding of the Association of County Councils' independent survey. The right hon. Gentleman argued in last May's debate that prices would not be affected by Sunday trading, but when more corner shops have closed and competition is reduced, price movements will undoubtedly reflect costs and rise. At present, small shops are only just hanging on in the face of such competition.

I am very close to the retail trade. I am not merely a member of the all-party retail group; I am involved in the retail sector as well—at the poor end, which is under pressure, which has given so much ground in recent years and which, frankly, is terrified of this Bill. In recent days I have been at pains to consult over as wide a cross-section as possible, and I know of no one who is not opposed to the extension of Sunday trading. Shopkeepers believe that such a development will be detrimental to themselves, their families and retail workers, but if their competitors are to open, they insist that they, too, will have to open, whether they like it or not.

When Sunday is an ordinary shopping day, it may become an ordinary working day for many people in addition to those employed in the retail trade. Can we not have one day off, free from normal pressures, to provide opportunities for rest, recreation, reflection and worship? Must all the seven days now become the same?

Of course Sunday has changed, and it may now involve some of us in travel and organised recreation. But, as Cardinal Hume warns, there is a balance to be kept. The freedom to pursue leisure interests for some involves others in the obligation to work. There is more to social life than trading and commerce. Genuine humanism requires such a perspective. That is confirmed by the Christian vision of Sunday. That is why, if the roles were reversed, I would continue to believe that it is in the public interest to preserve the traditional Christian Sunday. Therefore, nothing would induce or pressure me into action that is calculated to threaten the traditional Christian Sunday.

The plain truth is that there is no overwhelming demand for the Bill, but a large proportion of the electorate, consisting only in part of churchgoers, bitterly oppose it. Small shopkeepers, as well as shop workers, feel threatened by it. On 4 March, the Daily Telegraph said:

> "Measures which outrage the deep feelings of large sections of the community and command the enthusiastic support only of doctrinaires and a few large commercial institutions do not make good politics."

In the opinion of the Catholic bishops of England and Wales:

> "The present law may indeed be flouted and in need of tidying up. We do not think the alternatives have been adequately proposed or examined."

In the light of the debate so far, I do not see how any hon. Member can quarrel with that judgment.

6.47 pm

Mr. Ivor Stanbrook (Orpington): It would be a mistake for any hon. Member who is opposed to the Bill to say that there is no need for a revision of Sunday trading law. On the contrary, there is great need for a revision of the law, not only because it is anomalous, but because much of it is unnecessary. What is more, there are parts of the Bill that are desirable, and I personally believe that the deregulation of shop hours on weekdays is justified. I would support that if it were the only part of the Bill.

But the question for answer is whether total abolition of the restrictions on Sunday trading is necessary in order to achieve the abolition of the anomalies. To put it another way, is a balance between commercial considerations and respect for Sunday as a special day desirable and possible? I believe that it is.

Let me also say straight away that I do not believe that this is a party political matter. Conservatives are not libertarians. We are not devotees of the free market to the extreme, certainly not to the extreme that involves conflict with a deeply rooted institution in the life of the British people and a part of our Christian heritage. Woe betide any Conservative party that goes against such institutions, because the Conservative party should at least live up to what its name implies—change only when there has demonstrably been a case for such change that does not destroy existing institutions. For that reason, although I sympathise with the wording of the reasoned amendment which has been selected, I and many of my hon. Friends who oppose the Bill will not support that reasoned amendment, because we want to make the point that this is not a matter of party politics. We shall march into the No Lobby under nobody's banner but our own.

[Mr. Ivor Stanbrook]

The Home Secretary offered consultations and mentioned certain procedural arrangements made by the Government to assist in the consideration of the Bill at this stage and beyond. Unfortunately for him, he said that the Government had an open mind on the matter. How on earth does he reconcile that with a three-line Whip on the principle of the Bill? I am sorry that he did not give way when I tried to put that to him during his speech. The principle of the Bill is the total abolition of all restrictions on Sunday trading. How can he say that he has an open mind when everybody is compelled to vote for that principle? That makes nonsense of the procedural concessions offered by my right hon. Friend.

The Government have made a number of tactical ploys. The offer of a Special Standing Committee appears to be a good idea—if only the Bill were suitable for that purpose. The specialist work of the Standing Committee has been done for us. That is what the Auld committee was for, and, whatever one might think about the conclusions of that committee, one knows that it did a good job in assembling the facts and marshalling the arguments.

Mr. Hurd: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Stanbrook: I shall give way to my right hon. Friend, although he did not give way to me.

Mr. Hurd: I seek to be helpful to my hon. Friend. I gave way extensively, and my hon. Friend rose towards the end of my speech. I am sorry that I did not give way to him, and I shall try to be helpful on the point that he has made. The Bill creates an empty site. It sweeps away a piece of legislation which, as my hon. Friend said, is inadequate. I do not think that he or anybody would argue that the matter can be righted simply by amending the 1950 Act. The Second Reading would clear the site, and the site is best cleared.

Mr. Stanbrook indicated dissent.

Mr. Hurd: My hon. Friend disagrees, and that will have to remain a disagreement between us. However, we all agree that the existing Act will not do, and giving the Bill a Second Reading will enable the Standing Committee, through the procedure that we have acknowledged, to construct, if it so chooses, a new building. That seems a perfectly logical and reasonable proceeding.

Mr. Stanbrook: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I hope that I shall be exempted from the ten minute rule because my right hon. Friend's intervention has taken so long.

Mr. Speaker: I shall bear that in mind.

Mr. Stanbrook: The point that my right hon. Friend does not appear to have grasped is that, if he gets a majority on Second Reading, it will logically be impossible to get a majority on any amendments to regulate opening hours on Sundays. The Government's argument will be that we have voted for the Second Reading. They will say, "You voted for the total abolition of restrictions on Sunday trading. How can you now seek to put in restrictions that will make total abolition impossible?" That is what would happen, and my right hon. Friend should know that the same thing applies about the offer of a free vote in the Standing Committee. Who will pick the members of the Standing Committee? If it is the Committee of Selection and it bears in mind that members of the Committee are to have a free vote, its composition may well be quite different from what my right hon. Friend would like it to be.

If the Bill fails tonight, that is it, but if it goes through I hope that my right hon. Friend will give encouragement to the adoption, where there appears to be a sizeable agreement, of an amendment that will keep Sunday special. The three-line Whip is an affront to the consciences of many of my hon. Friends. Even my right hon. Friend the Chief Whip has agreed that this is a matter of conscience. Everyone will agree that the restrictions on Sunday trading are not matters of conscience, yet we have a three-line Whip, compulsion, on a question of conscience, and we are given a free vote on the detail of restrictions. My hon. Friends have been misled by the Government's procedural tactics on the Bill to induce them to abstain on the vote, but they ought not to abstain. This is a clear-cut issue; either we abolish all restrictions on Sunday trading, as the Bill requires, or we consider a compromise, a balance, between those interests we know run deep, between the needs of modern commerce and the need to respect our traditional Sunday.

The Government should have offered us a free vote. If they had lost they could have said it was an honourable cause but that they had taken the view that the matter was susceptible to a free vote. If they had won, they could have cut the ground from beneath the feet of their opponents by saying that on a free vote this Bill on total deregulation had got through and that they were entitled to go ahead—as they now intend.

It is no satisfaction to me to oppose the Government on this issue because in many other respects the Government have done splendidly. However, they seem to have had a tendency recently to make errors of political judgment. This is not the first such error, but let us hope that it will be the last.

Mr. Laurie Pavitt (Brent, South): My speech will parallel that of the hon. Member for Orpington (Mr. Stanbrook) because my mind is running along similar lines. Hon. Members have been canvassed more on this issue than the average voter in Fulham has been canvassed in the last month. Our postbags have been full and we have had the facts, the polls and the figures. I do not propose to weary the House with the selected points in favour of my case for opposing the Bill because that has already been done. In the Auld report and in the information from polls that we conducted a number of points emerged. I am sorry that the Home Secretary did not give way when I tried to intervene. During his speech he allowed only one member of the Opposition to intervene. However, I will make the point now. As the House knows, I have been a Co-operative sponsored Member of Parliament. I am proud to have been, although I am no longer so sponsored because I am no longer a candidate, but I have been during the whole of my time in the House.

I wanted to ask the Home Secretary about his selection from the report by the Co-operative international research people. He gave just two sentences and failed to go through the report in which the whole of the Co-operative movement came down solidly against the passing of this Bill. The impression he gave the House, probably unwittingly, was quite the opposite. The hon. Member for Orpington has put his finger on the biggest botch-up of all time. I agree with the Home Secretary that the ground should be cleared because this is a ramshackle, jerry-built Bill. It is the most complete muck-up of the many mucked-up Bills that I have seen and the obvious thing is not to tinker about with the expertise of the Patronage Secretary or with the ways and means of circumventing the opposition to this Bill, but to take it away, finish this Bill tonight and start all over again.

I hope that a considerable number of right hon. and hon. Members will vote against the Bill. That will give the Home Secretary what he wants. It will clear the ground so that he can then have full consultation with all concerned and produce a second Bill that will receive consensus support. It has emerged from the debate that there is a consensus on a number of issues.

We all agree that the law has to be changed, that we have to accept changes in modern retailing, and that there should be protection for the special character of Sunday. A number of my local clergymen have been on to me about this, including the Bishop of Willesden. There is also much agreement on the subject raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Torney) concerning the effects of the Bill's provisions on shop assistants.

The ground could be most effectively cleared, and the Government would be showing a little political acumen for a change, if they would accept the decision of the House and introduce a new Bill at a later stage. Why is there such a hurry? Why is the Prime Minister so insistent that this legislation goes through here and now? Are the Government to have an election next June? Are they anxious to get this on the statute book immediately? There should be plenty of time for the Government to take away this botched-up Bill and get it right. This is not a party political point of view, because opposition to the Bill comes from both sides of the House.

The Auld report dealt thoroughly with wages councils. It said that if any changes were made, at least for retail distribution, the wages councils must be maintained. The Government have fudged that one, because by altering the rules and regulations they have left the wages councils in existence, but emasculated them so that many people who will be affected by the Bill, if it becomes law, will not be protected by wages councils.

I remind the House of the importance of the shop assistants and the wives of the people concerned. When the House passed the Licensing Act many years ago, when I first came to the House, the breweries were anxious that the pubs should open on Sundays until three o'clock because it would be beneficial to them. However, the publicans' wives said that this would interfere with their family life. The House made sure that pubs closed at two o'clock so that the roast beef and Yorkshire pudding could be consumed.

Certain philosophies are running behind both the desire for the Bill and opposition to it. Ever since I came to the House, we have been moving more and more towards a materialistic society, but there are other values. The quality of life is even more important than the quantity in it. As a young man, I was very impressed by the Earl of Stockton's book, "The Middle Way". He made a strong appeal for what he considers to be true Conservative values, and he set those out again recently in the other place. Therefore, I hope that Conservative Members who feel keenly about this will behave as I am sure that he would have done had he still been in the House. I hope that they will go into the Lobby and reject the Bill.

We should allow a breathing space so that all the interested parties can feel that they are participating in giving advice on the ultimate decision rather than being told what will happen. A breathing space would give us the opportunity to clear up the mess of the Bill with all its anomalies, and replace it with something based on the best traditions of the House, and on the tradition that we wish to preserve—that not all the days in the week are the same.

As Members of Parliament we go to many different churches, although I cannot claim to be a member of any. However, this matter affects not just churches. We must establish the importance of having a whole day in which one can breathe a sigh of relief because the pressures are off. The Bill would put the pressure on in an unacceptable way, and, as it is unacceptable, I hope that many Conservative Members who feel as I do, and I know that there are, will take their courage in their hands and vote against the Bill.

I have been a Government junior Whip and I know the power of a Whips' Office. The proposal to allow a free vote upstairs is not worth the paper on which it is written. However, because of the way that Committees are run, the Patronage Secretary is all-important and the payroll vote is sufficient to make sure that the Government get their way. Therefore, our only hope is that the Government will change their decision, that this Bill will not get its Second Reading and that this important matter gets a fresh start.

7.5 pm

Sir Adam Butler (Bosworth): Time does not permit me to comment fully on other speeches, but I shall pick up one point made by the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman). He chided some Conservative Members as being unlikely to stay on until midnight. However, matters of conscience are a 24-hour business. Those who intend to vote against the Bill will be here. We are worried that there will be laxity on the part of the Opposition, so I ask him to spend some time between now and midnight making sure that all his troops are here, particularly as I understand that the Opposition have a three-line Whip to vote against the Bill.

My hon. Friend the Member for Orpington (Mr. Stanbrook) deserves some commendation for the way in which he has held steadfast not just in opposing the Bill but in organising the opposition on Conservative Benches. Much to the discomfort of the Government Front Bench, we have maintained solidarity throughout. I hope that that solidarity can be maintained if we have to debate the Bill through its various stages.

I speak as a practising member of the Church of England—I am a church warden. At one time I was compelled to work on Sunday when I was a shift worker in a continuous manufacturing process, so I know from my own experience something about the arguments. There are many arguments, and it is important to concentrate on the important ones. I make no apology for repeating the argument already put by, for example, my right hon. Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire, South-East (Mr. Pym) and my hon. Friend the Member for Orpington.

We have to grasp the simple point that is fundamental and crucial to the debate. Despite all the arguments and inducements, this issue must decide how we vote today.

[Sir Adam Butler]

It is all very well to argue that the Bill may be amended in its progress. If the Bill is in a different state by the time it gets to Third Reading, so much the better, and we can judge whether or not to oppose it on that occasion. However, the principle of the Bill is not, as my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary would have us think, merely clearing the ground for possible amendment. It provides for total deregulation of shopping hours throughout the week and on Sunday. That is what the Government and the Bill's supporters want, but it is not what I want.

My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary is trying to persuade my hon. Friends who might be inclined to vote against the Bill to give it a chance and an opportunity for amendment. If my right hon. and learned Friend the Paymaster General, who is to wind up the debate, will, together with my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary, take the lead in amending the Bill, we may have other thoughts. However, my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary has already said that the Bill as it stands is preferable to any amendment, so his mind is not open; it is committed. The House might decide otherwise, but my right hon. Friend's mind is committed.

The Government's case rests on the libertarian principle of removing statutory restraints and letting the people decide. That is a fine, but dangerous principle, and it is not exclusive. What is government about if it is not to restrain the will or the actions of the people? Governments have done it again and again.

Mr. Fairbairn: No.
